Musicians perform at open mic night

Christopher Hanewinkel | COLLEGIAN
Jordan Hasty, junior in industrial engineering, performs during open mic night Thursday night in Union Station.

By Abby Brownback
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

About 10 aspiring musicians performed at an open microphone night Thursday in Union Station and received compact discs of their performances.

Campus Apple representative Jason Deehr, sophomore in fine arts, said he organized the open mic night to demonstrate how easy it is to use Apple computers in innovative ways.

"It'll be a nice little night of music and fun," Deehr said.

The musicians — some playing the guitar, some singing — performed two songs in about 10 minutes on stage. They were recorded using Apple's GarageBand software.

Deehr said the software allows users to plug a microphone, a guitar or as many as eight instruments into an Apple computer and record.

Virtual instruments can also be added.

For the open mic night, though, Deehr used a direct feed to record performers, then exported the recording as an MP3 file and created a CD for each performer.

Deehr markets Apple products to students, but he said this was not a sales pitch.

"I thought it would be fun to give a place for people who don't normally get to play," he said.

Alecia Stuchlik, sophomore in anthropology, played the guitar and sang two songs she wrote — "Waiting on You" and an untitled song. She said she likes to have an audience occasionally.

While Stuchlik said she doesn't plan to make a career out of music, she plans to continue playing and writing songs.

"Now it's become part of my life," she said.

College credits may not transfer

By Annette Lawless
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

College transfer students beware.

The longer a student waits, the more complicated the process might be to transfer credit hours from other academic institutions.

Credible university officials said K-State is raising its transfer credit standards, and eventually, will eliminate more credit hours from transferring to the university. Classes including biology and chemistry were among those rumored to become eliminated, especially in the case of community colleges.

The K-State Office of Admissions would not comment on specific courses.

"Courses must have similar curriculum to K-State, with information provided through a syllabus, textbook and coursework," said Jack Taylor, assistant director of undergraduate admissions. Through an accreditation company, K-State has "an articulation agreement with all community colleges. All of those courses should transfer."

Every year, two- and four-year colleges meet at the Kansas Core Competency Conference in Wichita, where they discuss educational curricula and the articulation agreement, Taylor said. Individual academic departments meet at the conference and set transfer equivalency standards.

The articulation agreement sets transfer credit hour rules between colleges. However, Taylor said, those policies can change in a matter of days.

If a department does change transfer equivalency of a course, Taylor said students must be aware of several facts.

Students who have transferred courses prior to equivalency changes should have no problems in terms of course equivalency, Taylor said. The original class equivalency transfer will be what appears on the student's transcript.

For example, if a student transferred with community college credit hours from 2001, but did not turn in the transcripts to K-State until 2002, the most recent equivalency change will apply to that student's degree.

In some cases, it can be at the student's disadvantage.

If students disagree with transfer credit equivalency, the student has the right to appeal to the student's college.

Area community college administrators, however, disagree with the transfer policy, at least to where departments claim students will get a better education at K-State.

"I would argue that we are higher quality," said Scott Kohl, Highland Community College-Wamego campus coordinator and 1999 K-State graduate. "Our instructors over here, for the one thing, graduated from four-year colleges. They have an idea of what the four-year schools are expecting."

Forty-one of the 48 instructors at the Highland Community College-Wamego campus have at least a master's degree, "versus a lot of math and science classes at four-year schools are taught by graduate students," Kohl said.

Though Kohl said he doesn't mean "to bag on K-State by just using grad students," he said "100 percent of instructors are geared and more focused on instruction instead of doing research. Four-year colleges mostly function as research institutions."

Kohl also argues that with four-year colleges, students will get lost among the hundreds of students taking a particular course. In some cases, classes are taught by multiple teachers, and with complicated math and science courses, Kohl said this could strain the student.

In terms of the quality of campus life, the Wamego campus has gone from using one to three buildings and nearly doubling in enrollment. About 800 to 1000 students attend Highland Community College-Wamego as well as a four-year college. Most of the students, Kohl said, are from K-State.

When students attend a community college instead of K-State, they risk hurting their education, said Andrew Bennett, professor of mathematics and chair of the Department of Mathematics curriculum committee.

"Our biggest issue is with Calc 2," Bennett said. "Most freshmen took Calc 1 from community colleges and then we have several fail or drop the course."

Nearly 60 percent of students enrolled in Calculus 2 last year were freshmen.

Three semesters ago, Calculus 2 courses launched an "exam zero" placement test. Within the first days of class, students would take this placement test for the class. Students who fail the exam cannot take the class.

Bennett said the testing process for exam zero is in preliminary stages, with no report available.

Problems like this are related to "having that many different teachers at many different places," Bennett said. Community colleges with multiple sites may not teach on the same level, complicating the validity of a course transfer syllabus.

Regardless of the transfer credit equivalency system, all administrators argued that the main goal of every college is to "educate students and get them prepared for whatever career we're getting them into," Kohl said. It's important that "cooperation between the community colleges and other school is the only way to get where we are trying to go: to teach the students."

TO THE POINT Credits should transfer from schools statewide

With nearly 1,500 students transferring from other colleges to K-State every year, one would figure the university would have a solid policy regarding transfer credit hours.

Every year, two- and four-year colleges met at the Kansas Core Competency conference, where they establish educational guidelines across the state.

These guidelines are originated as a broad tool for Kansas colleges to use, guaranteeing that students in math, science or other subject matters learn the same as students enrolled in other institutions.

But even these guidelines lack consistency.

If these guidelines were so strong, if they were all the same, students across the board should be able to transfer credit hours from XYZ Community College to K-State.

Students would not have to test into classes they want to advance to, wondering if they gained proper knowledge about the subject matter they once learned at their other college.

And K-State should enforce a deadline for colleges to review their academic transfer equivalency standards, so students understand the process better and the university can promote consistency in policies.

Is it fair to students who commit hundreds of hours to learning subject matter at another college?

If the university wants to serve its students best, officials must establish and enforce policies that make sense — policies that are stable and promote the best for each student's education.

To the point is an editorial selected and debated by the editorial board and written after a majority opinion is formed. This is the Collegian's official opinion.

Male observation

Some boys become men;
others never achieve adulthood

Illustrations by Eric Thompson | COLLEGIAN

There is this observation of men, which holds a glimmer of genuineness and seems to ring true, which I find absolutely intriguing: the idea that some boys can become men, but men some boys will never be.

This is not a contradiction with the basics of human biology and puberty, because of course boys mature physically into an adult male body, but it questions the way some men mature emotionally, socially and mentally while others do not and seem like they never will.

What separates a man from a boy, or a man from a guy?

College, as well as high school, is a time when one fumbles with terms, because they are not boys any longer but I hesitate to call many of them full-grown men, so they become guys.

These guys are wandering between manhood and boyhood.

There are adult males in the world that never seem to establish their place as men.

Like the guys skipping out on their responsibilities, such as children, or the jerks and the inconsiderate, mean guys. The guys who refuse to respect others, or themselves. The guys raping women. The guys who stand aside and let it knowingly happen. I do not think that these people are men.

So what is a man? A man is a person who accepts and fulfills the responsibilities of adulthood; a boy is one who doesn't want to be independent. I suppose being a man is something that has to be recognized internally before it can be visible to the rest of the world, and the moment of comprehension is valuable for the personal definition that men create about themselves.

Watching guys walking around campus, sitting in my classes and ambling into my life, it is interesting to estimate what kind of guy they are. Some are still awkward teenagers, unsure of how to handle new situations; others lack the bravery to stand alone as an independent and unique individual. Some explore the limits of the world with zest and curiosity, while others cower within a safe distance of their comfort zone, hesitant to leap, almost afraid of life.

There are those guys showing flickers of the great men they may become. Some are men already, and others look like they rammed naked, spoiled and irresponsible into a brick wall then spiraled off to stumble through life.

The contradictions of personalities and character varying within a single man are astounding to see and fascinating to discover or even to speculate upon.

What kind of men will most guys become, and which paths will they take? Some boys become well-adjusted men, others mutate into jerks, but most college guys are just that, guys.

Rachel Thompson is a sophomore in anthropology and international studies, with French and political science minors. Please send your comments to opinion@spub.ksu.edu.

Face transplants help the helpless

Most of you who have heard the story in the news recently, my initial reaction to hearing of the first partial face transplant was shock, and then I became extremely curious.

My first thought, and the most obvious one, was to wonder if the woman who received the transplant would now look like donor of the face.

The only answer I found wasn't exactly black and white.

The new skin would fit over the patient's own bone and muscle structure, which makes each face unique.

But because it still won't be her skin, nose or lips, she will never look exactly as she did.

This answer is what scares me most about this innovative new procedure.

The face, unlike a hand or a leg, is how we identify each other and ourselves when we look in the mirror. Knowing our own face or the face of a loved one has deep psychological roots.

I wonder how this woman will cope with the monstrous psychological burden of seeing her original face in her mind's eye, and another when she looks in the mirror.

My second thought was to try to imagine being in the place of the woman who received the transplant.

The bottom line is the idea of seeing a new nose, with a different shape than the one I have known all my life, and to feel different lips is unimaginable.

With this thought, I immediately decided that I would never be willing to be a candidate for this procedure under any circumstances.

But, in this situation, the possibility of feeling like a normal person again might be worth the fear and risk.

Another issue that has ignited controvery over the story is whether or not it is humane to take the face of another human being.

Based on my knowledge of the procedure, it is.

Just like a person has the choice to donate other organs when they die, it should be an option to donate the skin on their face. Whether a person decides that they want to help a victim of disfigurement or that they cannot live with the idea of their face living beyond them, it would be a personal choice.

If no one is forced into it, I cannot see how it could be considered inhumane.

While this procedure may seem like something from a horror film to us today, I believe it has the potential to be very valuable in the future.

If the psychological effects prove to be within human capacity and it is carried out humanely, it could give new hope that has never before been possible to countless victims. When a procedure has the potential to do this and is humane, we should be thankful to live in a world where advancements like this are being made in medicine.

Kansas public schools earn 'F' for science standards

By Annette Lawless
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

According to a recent Thomas B. Fordham Institute report, Kansas has the nation's worst public school science standards.

The national education group graded Kansas an "F" after adoption of Board of Regents science standards last month. The new standards allow public schools to educationally criticize the theory of evolution.

The 6-4 vote gave a victory to "intelligent design" advocates, who initially drafted the board-approved standards. According to the Intelligent Design Network, the theory of intelligent design argues the universe was created by a higher power as opposed to an undirected process such as natural selection.

Kansas' treatment of evolution "makes a mockery of the very definition of science," said representatives from Thomas B. Fordham Institute.

Supporters of the new standards argue the science changes will expose students to legitimate criticisms of the evolutionary theory, allowing more open discussion in the classroom.

"This is a great day for education," said Board of Education chairman Steve Abrams immediately after the board voted to change public school science standards. Abrams said the evolution theory conflicts with the Bible's version of creation of life on Earth.

Despite conflicting reviews from across the United States, some board members argue the change was one of the best decisions the board has made in recent years. "All that indicates to me is that they want evolution taught as a dogma," board member John Bacon said.

The new standards challenge several evolution theories, including members' statements saying there is a lack of evidence for the genetic code, fossils are inconsistent with evolutionary theory and the theory is only based on circumstantial evidence.

Authors of the report claim "relentless" promotion of intelligent design is the blame for the new changes.

"Creationists on the State Board of Education had disfigured an otherwise acceptable standards draft in order to expunge all reference to evolution and to all other historical science in support of evolutionary ideas," the report states. "A number of states have resisted this madness in their science standards, but too many are fudging or obfuscating the entire basis on which biology rests."

Additional problems the report addresses include physical science standards lagging behind other states, errors and misunderstandings with classroom experiments and lack of math application to science.

Other critics of state science standards, including K-State physics professor Bharat Ratna, argue the board's vote was a violation of church and state, only harming educational values in Kansas classrooms.

"Religion is all that has to do with intelligent design - it's an assumption," Ratna said. "Our whole modern society is kind of based upon science, medicine evolution. Teaching non-factual standards in Kansas classrooms is unethical, especially when these people were elected to do what's best for Kansas children."

iPods make lectures portable

By Kaley Lyon
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

With the increasing popularity of iPods, several universities across the nation are looking to take advantage of the new technology by working it into academic curricula.

K-State is among these universities, and two professors have made their class lectures available for students through iTunes and PowerPoint. By making this technology available, students can access lecture information on their computer and can cast it onto their iPods as well.

"Everybody we see on campus seems to have an iPod in their ears. The computer store says they can't keep them on their shelves," Bryan Vandiviere, Web presentation technology coordinator, said. "We see this becoming very handy, especially around review time."

This technology was implemented by William Shea, instructor of computer and information science, and Sue Williams, associate professor of sociology, during fall 2005.

Students enrolled in either of the classes Social Construction of Serial Murder or Fundamentals of Computer Programming could pause, rewind and repeat class lectures any time they desired.

"It would be more convenient because if you miss something in class or you're not paying attention, you can always go back for the recap," said Jared Konczal, freshman in pre-professional business iPods are beginning to be implemented into class lectures using Tegrity program to download lectures to an iPod.

administration "It would be nice to have that extra study tool so you wouldn't have to rifle through your notes when you're reviewing."

Vandiviere said he hopes the number of courses for which this technology is available will increase from two to 10-15 for spring 2006.

Course casting is a new approach to another technology the university has had since 1999: Tegrity. This software makes it possible for professors to record their lectures, which are then available on K-State Online.

One hundred ninety-eight professors currently use this technology, and more than 6,000 courses have been recorded since the software was installed.

"We see this being a great tool for faculty and students," Vandiviere said of iPod course casting. "The faculty don't have to do anything differently if they were using the Tegrity software previously in the course."

Coaching search fun while it lasted

It took K-State 20 days to replace the legendary Bill Snyder with the relatively unknown Ron Prince.

MATTHEW GIRARD

To be honest, I'm sad the K-State football coach search is officially over. I'm not sad about the decision to hire Prince, but I am bummed the excitement and craziness that has surrounded the search is over.

I know each day that passed without any announcements from Athletics Director Tim Weiser had Wildcat fans shaking in their purple snow boots, but the speculation and buzz consumed almost everyone in Manhattan.

You really couldn't go anywhere without overhearing someone talking about who was going to replace Snyder. I got involved in some discussions at the laundromat, grocery store and even at my wife's estrogen-laden salon.

Although the rumor mill immediately began churning about a replacement after Snyder announced his retirement Nov. 15, the initial week after was pretty quiet.

Names such as Brent Venables, Jim Leavitt, Gary Patterson and Dana Dimel were the first to come across the Internet message boards and news stories as possible successors. All were likely candidates, as all had worked under Snyder, which was a supposed requirement for Weiser.

Then, exactly a week after Snyder broke the majority of K-State hearts, the real fun began.

Venables was reported to be in Kansas and the message boards lit up with speculation, even though he was only back to tend to family matters after his mother's death.

It didn't stop the chatter though. Venables eventually dropped out of the search to stay at Oklahoma.

The rumors then focused on Leavitt, but on Nov. 29, the South Florida coach signed a seven-year, $7-million contract extension to stay with the Bulls.

After Venables and Leavitt withdrew, Houston coach Dana Dimel surfaced for maybe a day as a candidate. I think I even heard some talk about the recently fired Steve Mariucci.

Then, out of nowhere, ESPN's Ivan Maisel reported Prince was the front-runner to replace Snyder on Dec. 1. This, of course, sent reporters and Wildcat fans on a mad dash to find out everything they could about the Virginia offensive coordinator.

As soon as they learned a plane was sent to Charlottesville, Va., for the initial interview with Prince, members of the media began stalking Vanier Football Complex waiting for any kind of sign. There were even media members hanging out at the Topeka hotel where Prince stayed when he came to Kansas for a second interview.

Some fans also took it upon themselves to track the K-State plane as it made its way back to Kansas from Virginia, complete with updates on a Web site.

You just can't make this stuff up.

The amazing part for me was that this all took place in the span of a couple of days.

Since it was apparent after the second interview that Prince was going to be hired, the excitement died down and the talk turned into the same old boring stuff about the new coach's plans for the future.

The confirmation came through our crappy fax machine Sunday. Prince was announced Monday and the Wildcat nation breathed a collective sigh.

Sure, things will pick up again when the annual Purple-White Spring Game comes around. It's just too bad it won't be as fun as the 20-day span when it seemed like nothing else mattered and the town revolved around "The Quest."

Prince begins hiring new coaching staff

Staff Reports
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Ron Prince has been K-State's coach for less than a week, but he has not taken any time to bask in the glory of what he called his "dream job."

Prince began assembling his coaching staff almost immediately after his hiring, and on Thursday announced the hiring of his first four assistant coaches and the director of football operations.

Mo Latimore, who has been retained from Bill Snyder's previous staff, Tim McCarty, Tim Tibesar and Pat Washington make up the first round of assistant coaches on Prince's staff. Prince also announced the appointment of Abby Boustead as the Wildcats' director of football administration.

"I am very pleased to be announcing the initial members of my staff here at Kansas State," Prince said in a release. "This is a very experienced and knowledgeable group. There is no doubt in my mind that they know what it takes to be successful at this level and that each of them brings a proven track record of getting the absolute best from the young men they coach."

Latimore, a 21-year K-State veteran and a graduate of the university, will retain his previous position as defensive line coach. This will be Latimore's fourth staff at K-State, as he first began coaching in 1976 as a graduate assistant under Ellis Rainsberger.

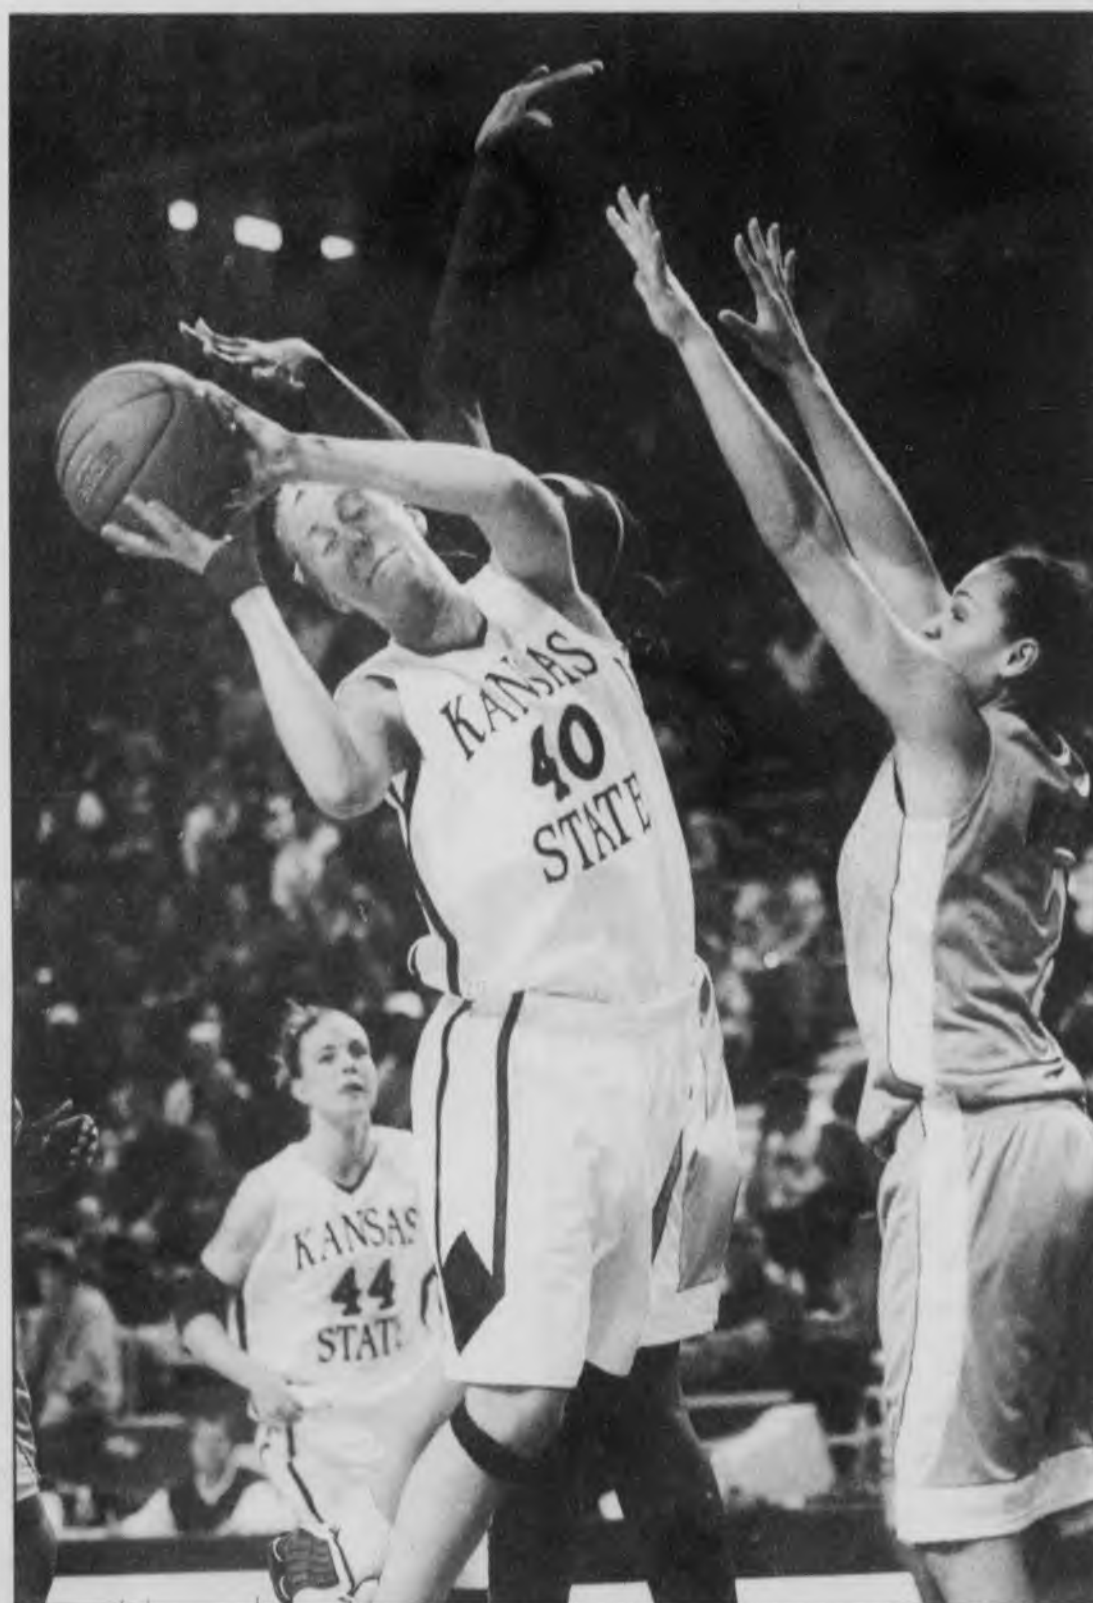

He also worked under Jim Dickey (offensive line, outside linebackers, defensive ends) before joining Bill Young at Texas El-Paso in 1984 as a defensive line coach. In 1989 he went with Bob Stull to Missouri and served as an assistant coach in charge of the Tigers' defensive line before returning to K-State in 1994 to join Bill Snyder's staff, where he has been ever since.

McCarty, a veteran head coach, comes to K-State from East Central University, where he served as the Tigers' head coach the past two seasons. He will serve as the Wildcats'

K-State looking for 7th win against UMKC

By Angie Hanson
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

'Tis the season to be jolly, and after defeating Louisiana Tech at home on Tuesday, K-State is feeling the holiday spirit.

Now, all the Wildcats (6-1) want for Christmas is another home victory, this time against UMKC (2-6) on Sunday.

Coach Deb Patterson said she knows her team is far from perfect, but after the Cats' win over a talented Louisiana Tech team, she's seen her team transition from a young, inexperienced team, to one that's more mature.

"It gave them a better understanding of how to play a close score and close possessions," Patterson said. "They held their own down the stretch against Louisiana Tech, and I thought they mentally approached a bounce-back game as well as we could've asked at this early stage in the season."

Freshman Shalee Lehning, who tied the single-game school rebound record of 20 against the Lady Techsters, said the win against Louisiana Tech increased the Wildcats' confidence in their ability to finish a game.

"We're aggressive, focused and hard-working," Lehning said of her team at this point in the season. "We're willing to do what it takes to get it done."

From here on out, K-State is entering each game, including its match up against UMKC, expecting to win, freshman JoAnn Hamlin said, and to do that, the Cats have continued to work on offense, defense, physicality and intensity.

"We're looking to win the game when we step on the court," Hamlin said.

Patterson said she agreed. "We're growing as a team that is willing and able to play very physical there on both ends of the floor," she said. "We're continuing to establish go-to players on both ends of the floor, understand what it is we're looking for on each offensive position and then maximize those opportunities that we have defensively."

The Cats will have another opportunity to grow when they take on UMKC in the two teams' ninth meeting.

"They're a basketball team that represents this Missouri-Kansas rivalry," Patterson said. "They're a good program with a lot of players who have competed with or against a lot of players in our program. We'll have our edge, and they'll have theirs."

K-State is 5-3 in its series against the Kangaroos, and in last year's Dec. 11 matchup, the Cats beat UMKC 63-31.

After K-State's win over Louisiana Tech, junior Twiggy McIntyre is leading the team with 14.6 points per game, and Lehning is pacing the Cats in rebounds (6.7) and total assists (36).

While the Wildcats enter Sunday's game with another victory on their record, UMKC will go in with a two-game losing streak, having lost to Kansas and Arkansas. It might be attributed to the fact that the 'Roos are averaging 59.8 points a game, compared to their opponents' 68.4 average.

The margin between UMKC and the Cats is large, as K-State is averaging 93.5 points per game, while its opponents are averaging 68.5.

CFB | Colorado investigates more allegations

BOULDER, Colo. — Colorado has asked school attorneys to review an unsigned letter that makes allegations of improper conduct against embattled football coach Gary Barnett, a university spokeswoman said Thursday.

Some of the allegations in the letter, which was first reported by the Rocky Mountain News, have already been investigated, spokeswoman Michelle McKinney said. She said the attorneys are trying to determine whether any of them warrant further investigation.

Among the unproven allegations forwarded to the school in October:

- Barnett tried to influence testimony in depositions and to the grand jury.
- The team sometimes had 10 coaches on the sideline, in violation of NCAA rules allowing only nine.
- Football players were forewarned about random drug tests.
- Barnett failed to discipline players and said in another instance that everything had been done to protect a player.
- Questions about the handling of money, particularly from football camps.

MLB | Rangers trade Soriano to Nationals

DALLAS — All-Star second baseman Alfonso Soriano was traded by the Texas Rangers to the Washington Nationals on Wednesday night for Brad Wilkerson, Turrel Sledge and a minor league pitcher.

The deal was pending physicals.

With a rare combination of power and speed, Soriano has been one of the most productive infielders in the majors the past four years. He hit .268 with 36 homers, 104 RBI and 30 stolen bases last season, when he earned $7.5 million.

MLB | Red Sox deal

Renteria to Braves for Marte

DALLAS — The Boston Red Sox gave up on Edgar Renteria just one year after lavishing a four-year, $40 million contract on him, trading the shortstop to the Atlanta Braves on Thursday for third base prospect Andy Marte.

The move left Boston without a shortstop, but Red Sox senior adviser Bill Jaffe denied a much-rumored deal that would wheel Marte to the Tampa Bay Devil Rays for Julio Lugo. Jaffe said he expected to see Marte play for the Red Sox this year, putting him in the outfield or first base if it's necessary to get his bat in the lineup.

The Braves needed a shortstop after Rafael Furcal signed a three-year, $39 million free agent contract with the Los Angeles Dodgers.

NHL | Lemieux diagnosed with an atrial fibrillation

PITTSBURGH — Pittsburgh Penguins owner-captain Mario Lemieux was discharged from a hospital Thursday after being diagnosed with atrial fibrillation, an irregular heart-beat that can be treated with medication and should not affect his career.

Lemieux, 40, was admitted to an undisclosed Pittsburgh hospital after practice Wednesday, after complaining of an irregular heartbeat — a condition team general manager Craig Patrick said Lemieux has experienced several times in recent weeks.

After being evaluated overnight, doctors diagnosed the problem and told Lemieux he should rest and go on medication. He is expected to take it easy for a week to 10 days, after which the team will determine when he can resume play.

Holiday classics

10 quality Christmas films that will inspire laughs and spread the Christmas spirit

1. "It's A Wonderful Life"
A perennial TV favorite at this time of year, there's a reason this Frank Capra film has stuck around for over 50 years. The film tells the story of George Bailey, a burnt-out family and business man contemplating suicide on Christmas Eve who encounters a divine visitor sent to change his mind.

Watch it with: Parents, grandparents, or anyone who's a fan of classic films

2. "A Christmas Story"
A visit to a department store Santa, puffy snowsuits, and an infamous triple-dog dare make this movie laugh-until-you-cry hilarious. Young Ralphie's quest for a Red Ryder BB gun will make viewers fondly remember the childhood gift they could not live without.

Watch it with: Siblings

3. "A Charlie Brown Christmas"
Charles Schultz' beloved Peanuts Gang touchingly explores the true reason for the season in this understated film. Charlie Brown's scraggly Christmas tree and Linus' heartfelt final speech are unforgettable.

Watch it with: Anyone sick of holiday materialism

4. "National Lampoon's Christmas Vacation"
Anyone all too familiar with the chaos and crowding that comes with visiting relatives will relate to the Griswolds' plight in this film. Mr. Griswold's snatching of a Christmas tree is a side-splittingly funny lesson of what not to do during the holiday season.

Watch it with: Anyone but your in-laws

5. "Bad Santa"
Billy Bob Thornton's boozy, foul-mouthed, safe-cracking Santa turns the holiday tradition of saccharine sentimentality on its ear. Watching this irreverent film may put you on the big man's naughty list, but it is well worth the risk.

Watch it with: Someone age 17 or older

6. "How the Grinch Stole Christmas"
Dr. Seuss' delightfully devious Grinch schemes to stop the joyful Whos' Christmas celebration by stealing their gifts, decorations and holiday feasts. This green meanie may have garlic in his soul, but innocent young Cindy Lou Who manages to teach him the joy of Christmas, with or without all of its fancy trimmings.

Watch it with: A young cousin, niece or nephew

7. "Love Actually"
An over-the-hill pop star's stab at a holiday hit, a nativity lobster, and 10 overlapping stories of love and relationships make this British film an alternative to traditional Christmas fare. Alternately wickedly funny and hopelessly romantic, this smart and edgy film may become your new holiday favorite.

Watch it with: Your significant other

8. "Elf"
Will Ferrell stars as Buddy, a man raised by Santa's elves, who sets out in search of his long lost father in New York City. The film deliciously skewers the cutesy clichés of children's Christmas movies, but Buddy's unfaltering optimism and Christmas spirit may leave you feeling a little bit warm and fuzzy.

Watch it with: Friends

9. "Miracle on 34th Street"
A humorless young girl who does not believe in Santa Claus begins to change her mind as she gets to know the jolly man who portrays him at the department store her mother manages. This classic 1947 film explores the magic of the holiday season for both children and adults.

Watch it with: The cynical kid next door

10. "Home Alone"
Who could forget this mischievous caper flick that launched Macaulay Culkin's rise to fame? He plays Kevin, a kid who's fed up with his large family and wishes they would disappear at the height of the holiday season. But when his wish comes true, he is forced to defend himself and his home from the sticky fingers of two bumbling bandits.

Watch it with: Your family

Review by Christina Hansen

Christmas is right around the corner, and there is no better way to get into the spirit of the season than to watch a holiday-themed movie.

While the words "Christmas" and "movie" in the same sentence often inspire visions of schmaltzy tearjerkers or cutesy kids' flicks, there are plenty of quality Yuletide films available to enjoy with some gingerbread and a cup of steaming hot cocoa.

The following list of Christmas films will not only tickle the funny bone, they may stir up the sentimental side of even the most determined holiday Scrooge.

MATT PETERWORTH

Do you have any suggestions on finding and meeting someone to date, other than Facebook.com? Part II:

I went clubbing for the first time the summer after my freshman year. Having found the girl at the club that I was most attracted to, I pushed my way through the dance floor and positioned myself next to her. She was dancing with her friend, and it would have been too assuming of me to just start dancing with them. I turned my back, closed my eyes and started dancing. Hey, you've got to dance like no one's watching.

After a few minutes, I noticed the two ladies were gone, so I left the dance floor to go look for my friends. As I was talking to them about this girl I had been dancing next to, I noticed her friend pushing the girl that I was attracted to in my general direction. I asked my friends to excuse me as I went to go talk to her. We immediately hit it off, talking for two or three hours.

Also that summer, I went to a street dance. There were more people at this dance than at the club. Once again, I quickly picked out the girl that I was most attracted to. However, her situation kept throwing me off her trail. She was with her girl friend, and there was always this guy around. Obviously he was a boyfriend of one of them, but I did not know which one.

After the first slow dance, I figured out that the boyfriend belonged to the other girl. But every time that I wanted to go talk to the girl I liked, there was always some other guy around.

I'm a polite guy and never like to interrupt other people's conversations. But I don't like waiting in line to talk to a girl. Almost the whole evening went by without an opportunity. Then the second to last song came on. It was a slow song. The other girl began dancing with her boyfriend.

The girl I liked started walking off the dance floor saying something about how she didn't have anyone to dance with. Without thinking, I quickly intercepted her and asked her to dance. She accepted, and after making our general introductions, we talked for a few minutes about the pointlessness of school. The song ended and we went our separate ways.

these girls since, but the stories are meant to prove one thing: patience. Be patient and be able to recognize any opportunity you have to talk to a girl you like. Whether it is at a club, at a dance, at a party, or on the way to class, don't be afraid to go up to any girl you like and talk to her.

Ladies, these two examples are meant to prove one thing: guys are stupid. I almost went an entire evening without approaching the girl at the dance. Thankfully, in the first situation, the friend was there to push the girl towards me. Ladies, don't be afraid to make the first move.

McCarty guided the East Central program to a 6-4 finish in his first season in 2004 after being picked last in the Lone Star Conference's North Division that year.

A 1985 graduate of Fort Hays State, McCarty also has Kansas coaching ties, as he helped build Tabor College (Kan.) into an NAIA power. In his first season at Tabor in 1999, the Bluejays had just 14 players in the program and struggled through a 0-10 campaign. But in 2000, McCarty guided the Bluejays to a 3-7 record, a 5-5 mark in 2001, a 6-4 record in 2002 and ultimately a 9-2 record in 2003, a season in which Tabor achieved a No. 15 national ranking and the program's first berth in the NAIA playoffs.

Tibesar, will be in charge of the Wildcats' special teams units. A 1994 graduate of North Dakota, Tibesar returned to his alma mater in 2001 as the Fighting Sioux's inside linebackers coach. In 2003 he was promoted to defensive coordinator, and over the last two seasons, has constructed one of the best defenses in the Division II ranks.

North Dakota's defense ranked first in the North Central Conference in total defense, scoring defense, rushing defense, pass efficiency defense and quarterback sacks both seasons and was consistently ranked among the national leaders in each category. In 2004, the Fighting Sioux led all of Division II in scoring defense, yielding just 12.2 points per game.

Tibesar came to UND after spending one season as tight ends coach at Cornell in 2000. Prior to that, Tibesar was a graduate assistant and assistant offensive line coach at the University of California (1999), a linebacker coach at Grossmont (Calif.) College (1998) and a student-assistant at San Diego State (1997-98).

He earned first-team All-America honors as a senior and third-team honors as a junior and was a three-time GTE/COSIDA Academic All-American.

The final coaching announcement was quite possibly the most prominent name, as Washington was a long-time wide receivers coach at the University of Tennessee and will take over in the same capacity at K-State.

Credited with much of the success of the Volunteers' strong passing game, Washington developed a number of high-profile receivers during his 11-year tenure in Knoxville, including players like Donte Stallworth, Cedric Wilson, Peerless Price, Marcus Nash and Joey Kent that led Tennessee to be known as Wide Receiver U. He also helped coach the Vols to the 1998 national championship.

Also named to Prince's staff Thursday was Boustead. She comes to K-State from UNLV, where she served as the administrative coordinator for the football program since 2003.

A 1999 graduate of Buena Vista University, Boustead worked with Prince at Virginia, serving as the athletics department's facilities and event coordinator from 2001 to 2003.

Bush nominated Harriet Miers, White House Counsel, in early October to take O'Connor's seat. Her nomination was met with heavy resistance based on a perceived lack of experience and before the month was over Bush had accepted her withdrawal from the nomination process.

On the last day of October, Bush nominated 3rd U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals Judge Samuel Alito.

His nomination is still pending.

LONDON LECTURES

Three speakers delivered Landon Lectures at McCain Auditorium this semester. Japanese Ambassador Ryozyo Kato, former Soviet leader Mikhail Gorbachev and media mogul Ted Turner took the podium to comment on national issues.

"Sometimes people say I gave away the countries of the USSR," Gorbachev said. "I say I gave them back to their people."

The former leader's lecture drew thousands of people, many of whom were turned away once McCain Auditorium and overflow seating in the K-State Student Union were filled.

The next speaker planned for the lecture in Sen. Sam Brownback, R-Kan., who is slated for February 21.

ABORTION DISPLAY MAKES CAMPUS VISIT

Justice For All, a group organized to support the banning of abortion, brought several graphic billboards to K-State to argue their cause Oct. 24 through the 27.

The 20-foot-high displays were covered in graphic images of aborted human fetuses that many found difficult to view, or stomach.

"I think whether you're pro-life or pro-choice it's incredibly offensive to see these pictures," said Inger Leslie, senior in social work.

holiday celebrations, the ceremony is scheduled to avoid conflict with holiday plans.

"We want, as a university, to leave as much time open to return home safely from the end of the semester to the beginning of the holidays," he said. "By having commencement as far away from the beginning of Christmas and other holidays, we can allow time for students and others to travel safely."

Another reason for having finals a week after commencement ceremonies is that many faculty members have also already left campus by the end of finals week.

"It is much better for the students to have the faculty around during the commencement," said Beth Unger, vice provost for academic services and technology.

Commencement is scheduled this way for a few other reasons: the spring semester is considered to be the end of the school year; more students typically graduate then; the weather is nicer; the time frame does not conflict with other events; and the spring semester is one day longer than the fall semester (the minimum number of days classes must meet in the fall is 75 days, but 76 in the spring).

As the academic calendar is complex and must meet state guidelines, a university calendar committee meets every semester to review the calendar and make necessary changes.

Under the current system, the calendar is set seven years in advance — the current calendar will be effective until summer 2010.

As a result, the committee has little say in setting the calendar, but has the ability to amend any conflicting dates, Synoground said.

"We really try to make the calendar friendly to faculty, students, to the whole university," Nielsen said. "We try to accommodate everyone as well as we can to meet state guidelines and provide ample time for the best quality education we can."

but if you buy it used for $75, you still get the $50," he said. "If you factor it all in, all the books we sell, and all the books we buy back, students are getting over half their money back."

While Varney's tries to buy back most books, there are still some it will not purchase.

When selling back books, students must bring a photo ID. An ID is needed so both bookstores have evidence if a book is stolen, Denise Threewit, supervisor for the Union Bookstore, said.

"Unfortunately, there are those people who steal books, and we have to be able to tell police that we saw their ID," Threewit said.

Sarah Brown, freshman in open option, and Emily Relph, freshman in food and nutrition-exercise science, stopped by the Union between classes to sell back a few textbooks.

Relph said she received $30 for one book she purchased for $85, and she wasn't able to sell back another of her books.

Brown said she spent $400 at the beginning of the semester and only got $35 back after selling all but one of her books.

"I got back 75 cents off one, but it only cost me $5," she said. "I was happy to get anything back, so I'm not complaining."

1,350 to graduate in Manhattan, Salina ceremonies

By Lacey D. Mackey
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Commencement ceremonies for fall 2005 K-State graduates will be today and Saturday in Manhattan and Salina. An estimated 1,350 students are candidates for graduation this fall.

The ceremonies will start at 1 p.m. today in McCain Auditorium for the Graduate School.

Adrian Cronauer, a Vietnam veteran, attorney, writer and disc jockey, will speak at the Graduate School commencement.

Cronauer worked in the Armed Forces Radio Service in Saigon in 1965-1966 and co-wrote the original screenplay that portrayed himself in the 1987 movie "Good Morning, Vietnam."

Ron Trewyn, vice provost for research and dean of K-State's Graduate School and long-time friend of Cronauer, said Cronauer will provide a great speech, likely related to aspects of military service.

Cronauer's speech is tentatively titled "Positive Values and Being an American."

"He has one of the greatest voices I've ever heard," Trewyn said. "When he does the wake-up Vietnam call, it's a boomer. He brings a very, very diverse background and in a fun manner."

Ceremonies at K-State-Salina will begin at 7 p.m. today for the College of Technology and Aviation. Joe De la Torre, assistant to the president of the American Trucking Association in Washington, D.C., will be the commencement speaker.

Brendan Haiduk, senior in aeronautical technology-professional pilot and president of the K-State-Salina Government Association, will also speak today in Salina about student success after college.

"It's important to hear students' perspective, as opposed to just the deans and teachers," Haiduk said.

Commencement ceremonies will continue at 9 a.m. Saturday at Bramlage Coliseum.

Kelly Moon, administrative assistant for the vice provost of academic services and technology, has been helping organize commencement events for several years.

Moon said music performed by a bagpipe player has been a tradition at the commencement ceremony for the past few years.

"It gets people's attention to begin commencement," Moon said.

Household items popular gifts

By Hannah Crippen
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

For many K-State students, December not only brings holiday presents, but also graduation presents.

According to Hallmark, graduation is the sixth largest card-sending occasion in the United States. For 2005 graduations, Hallmark offered more than 1,200 graduation cards, including career- and degree-specific cards. In one of the most popular types of cards, the money-holder, Hallmark offered more than 60 cards.

Nancy Lauer, manager of Coach House Gifts in Manhattan Town Center, said the most popular item bought for graduates is a money-holder card. She also said collectibles, like Precious Moments and Boyds Bears, are popular. Some other favorites are graduation frames and K-State items, like lamps, clocks and supply sets.

Lauer said Coach House Gifts also carries business card holders for soon-to-be employees.

Ashley Roos, December graduate in industrial engineering, said she will move to Shawnee, Kan., to work as a business analyst. She said she has already received a check as a graduation gift.

"A lot of people are asking for money," Roos said. "Also, I am getting a laptop from my job, but if I wasn't, I would ask for one for graduation."

Roos said she also requested gift certificates to stores where she can purchase clothes for her new job.

"In college, we don't really dress up, so we need to upgrade things," she said. "People need new home furnishings if they are moving away."

A television is one household item graduating students may lack. All televisions that are $299 and more are now on sale at Best Buy, except for the Sony XBR and clearance and closeout products.

Nathan Hands, December graduate in kinesiology, will attend the Palmer College of Chiropractic in Davenport, Iowa. He said money and household items, like coasters, are high on students' graduation wish lists, including his.

for graduation. Luggage is also helpful for graduates who will be traveling as part of their job. Roos will be doing a lot of traveling, so she asked for a luggage set she said.

Roos said she will also receive a digital camera for graduation.

Target, too, offers many graduation ideas, from home furnishings and electronics to clothes and entertainment. As many graduates may own iPods, iPod accessories may be a perfect gift idea.

And after the gifts are opened, graduates may need cards on which to write thank-you notes. According to Hallmark, 3 percent of cards Americans send are thank-you cards, and sales have continued to increase over the past seven years.

Job market growth creates more positions

By Adam Hanks
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

After graduating, students are left with the question of what to do next.

Many K-State graduates seeking jobs will be greeted by a growing job market, according to the Bureau of Labor Statistics.

According to the Bureau, employment in the United States is expected to rise by about 15 percent. This translates into more job opportunities for graduates. This growth is being led by the medical field, which has grown by as much as 59 percent by 2012.

"It's not anything too shocking," said Michelle Haupt, coordinator of education and personal development. "All of the top jobs are things you would expect."

Even though these markets are in need of more students, it is important not to use these numbers to decide on a major, said Kerri Day Keller, director of Career and Employment Services.

"I think that is probably one of the worst things you can do in career planning," she said. "Certainly, you want to consider the employment outlook when you are considering your major, but that doesn't take into any consideration as to what your interests may be."

If students can't find a job after school, they shouldn't rule out other careers, Keller said.

"It is hard for students to understand that there are many directions you can take your majors, and if you just start asking around, you can find that there are people in all kinds of positions that don't have anything to do with what their major is," she said.

Most K-State graduates do seek employment after college, Keller said. For the class of 2003-2004, about 70 percent were employed after graduating, 20 percent continued their education and 8 percent were still seeking jobs. Also, most K-State graduates stay in Kansas, and many go to the Kansas City area.

CES offers several job fairs and workshops throughout the year. These activities help students get internships, which lead to future employment, Keller said.

"One of the things that employers are interested in is relevant experience, so no matter what your major may be, getting some experience through an internship or part-time job will help you be more marketable when you are looking for your first-time position," she said.

Employers plan to increase starting offers

By J. Scott Bowman
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

As students consider post-graduation job options, one of the deciding factors between two jobs can be the starting salary.

Kerri Day Keller, director of Career and Employment Services, said according to the National Association of Colleges and Employers' last report, many employers are planning to increase salaries in 2006.

"Before, the job market has been so tight that there really wasn't a dramatic increase in salaries," she said.

NACE reports quarterly, through surveys of employer and college members, starting salary offers to new college graduates. It also forecasts trends in the job market.

For more information

■ Career and Employment Services at www.k-state.edu/ces or at 532-6506.
■ The National Association of Colleges and Employers at www.naceweb.org.

NACE predicted, in a September report, that employers expect to hire 14.5 percent more new college graduates in 2005-06 than they did in 2004-05. NACE also reported that "the average starting salary offers to new college grads continue to increase," in its fall 2005 report.

Management information systems graduates reported a 5 percent increase in their average starting salary offer - something that Brian Niehoff, head of the Department of Management, said he did not find surprising.

"I know over here (in the College of Business) figures show that MIS is the highest in average salaries," Niehoff said. "In the late 1990s, before Y2K, salaries were higher because (employers) needed people for Y2K, but then they dipped down after that, and I've heard that they're starting to make a comeback again."

Competition may be another reason salaries are increasing. NACE found that more than half of employers plan to be on campus in spring 2006, up 10 percent from spring 2005.

This means more career fair opportunities for students, Niehoff said, and employer competition is good for students.

He said K-State students tend to be prepared for career fairs, which becomes obvious as graduation nears.

"I feel a lot of graduates are leaving with jobs in hand," Niehoff said. "Some aren't, but sometimes those people are location-bound, but I think we are seeing a job market rebound."

"(At K-State) I think it's a combination of things for students being prepared. CES does a good job helping students with resumes, and there are a lot of student organizations that have meetings before career fairs, and CES comes around and speaks with them."

Keller said starting salary can be important, but students need to look beyond salary.

"We like to remind students to not just look at salary, but benefits," she said. "Look at the benefits package, retirement and all of the other things that might add value to a job."

"Plus, don't just look at entry level. Some career fields may be very good for future earnings, but not great at the entry level."

7 years later, graduate-to-be wants refund

Besides doctors and Tommy Callahan, who goes to college for seven years?

That's right, my college career began in fall 1998, and Saturday it will be over.

I've learned a lot in my college tenure.

For instance, after one semester, I realized engineering wasn't for me. Fortunately, I know I'm not the only one in that leaky boat.

I've learned open-option is a good place to be, but not for two years, and my liver can attest to that.

But I've learned college, like most things in life now, is a business.

Don't get me wrong; I've learned a ton here. I have met some of the best people. I've been taught by some great teachers. I learned a lot about myself and the world.

Over time, though, it has become increasingly apparent to me that money, not education, is the most important thing to college administrators. Perhaps it's a problem of bureaucracy, because in the eyes of the university, J. Scott Bowman is not funny man and pie advocate, he is eID jsb5135.

I won't get into the problems parking caused, but I want to get to the guts of the issue: the priorities of education.

I once took an art class that my professor told us couldn't afford supplies. Paints and color pencils I could understand, but he said the department couldn't afford paper towels and told us to bring two or three rolls for the next class period.

Except for probably kindergarten, I don't think I ever had to bring paper towels to class. Perhaps it's a mundane detail, but you would

Besides buying seemingly trivial supplies, today I'm paying about twice as much for my education as I was seven years ago.

Later in my college career, I learned I had to jump through hoops to get my diploma. Besides the graduation fee — yes, there is a fee to graduate — I had to take several pointless classes (even excluding the time I was undecided on my major). Running at about $450 a pop, not to mention hours of lecture and homework, that is wasted money.

Maybe it's a lack of cooperation between teachers and students. These classes were the ones I had to retake due to instructors' lack of understanding the necessity of excused absences. Though, perhaps now that this is published, I might have to retake it a third time.

Now that I am a day away from receiving two pieces of paper that say I graduated from K-State, I'm not a satisfied customer.

If I were to go to a steakhouse and order a sirloin cooked medium well, I would be upset as hell, and I imagine anyone would, if a raw slab of beef was plopped down in front of me on a dinner plate. And I'd want my money back — especially if the waiter told me the establishment required diners to slaughter their own cow and cook their own meat, on top of paying for the meal. And there would, of course, be a fee to leave the restaurant.

After seven years of education, I'm still proud to be a Wildcat, but I want my money back.

If not, I want a coupon good for one degree at any participating university.

College about teaching, bettering self

Graduation comes with the hurrying about of those headed for grander, more profitable, things and those who have vanquished the specter of pride, along with any aspirations of living above the poverty line, and set off for a graduate degree.

Retrospection could be in order for some.

"What have the last four (five, eight, 25, etc.) years truly meant for me?"

Four years is a substantial amount of time in the life of the average homo sapien. In the span of four years, countries rise and fall, presidential elections take place and Ted Turner can get halfway through a Landon Lecture.

So why is it that we sacrifice these four years when, at the time, the only gain is an earth-shattering hangover the Saturday after finals?

The journey through the university is a journey that sees personal betterment as its final destination. It is through the sacrifice and perseverance of college that we cease to be poorly-educated idiots and enhance ourselves into liberally-educated, well-rounded idiots.

But there exists a greater aspect than simply earning our smarts.

The majority of university attendees (with the exception of golf course management majors) come to learn that, in addition to booze, cheap romance, Aggieville and class, the university experience requires sacrifice, hard work and a slow seeping in of the maturity of adulthood.

Finding the way, and walking to it on our own tottering legs, is the challenge.

For many, the robbed conclusion of university endeavors will remain unfulfilled. Some of those who abandon the academic road find success and fulfillment in different areas. Others seek refuge in parents' basements and vans down by the river.

But for those who find their way to the pearly gates of graduation, the achievement is one all their own. It is at the university that we learn that success is measured in individual achievement, as evidenced by university disciples clamoring for graduation awards that sound Latin and ominous.

How big is your honor rope? I'll show you mine if you show me yours. Oh wait, I'm not graduating.

The university sends graduates into the real world, which is generally more fun and less antagonistic than "The Real World" would have us believe. From ramen noodles to riesling is the dream. To be poor now is the penance we make in hope of never being poor again.

Chemists, journalists, bakers, military officers and entrepreneurs heave mortarboards into the air, and, in doing so, celebrate a journey that began with Ms. Barnes teaching us to add in first grade and conclude with Dr. Dumbledore encouraging us to analyze investment patterns of multi-national corporations in French Guiana.

So whether your journey continues or ends as of Dec. 16, the experiences, the lessons and the self-reliance gleaned from the years spent at a university will continue to be pivotal in the decisions we will make throughout our lives.

From Harvard to Holton Hall comes the promise of new thoughts, challenged ideas, heresy, lunacy, disobedience and dissent.

Although we will likely not remember Dr. Dumbledore's endless lectures in 30 years (hopefully you will still remember how to add), we will still remember we had a class with Dr. Dumbledore. We might not remember 70 percent of what we were taught in college, but college is as much, or more, about what you teach yourself. The tired information contained within the endless volumes of textbooks we digest every semester is simply extra.

Jonas Hogg is a junior in sociology, international studies and Russian.

Faculty offer advice for graduates

Graduation can be a stressful time of saying good-bye to friends, starting new careers and beginning a new chapter in one's life. Below are tidbits of advice from K-State faculty about what they wish they had known upon graduation.

"Even though it would be really hard sometimes, I wish I had paid off my credit card every month. When I went to buy my first house, it was difficult because of the accumulated credit card debt."

-John Grable, associate professor of family studies and human services

"The shift after college is one of the most dramatic changes one will make in life. A lot of the shifts and changes are hard on your system, and it is important to recognize they won't be easy, even if they are positive. After college, you must say good-bye to one part of your life and transition to the new part."

-Fred Newton, directing professor of University Counseling Services

"While I advocate taking advantage of services like Career and Employment Services, you don't have to have it all figured out after graduation. Your first job out is just one of many steps after graduation. Don't resort to graduate school just because you want to avoid looking for a job. You will get more out of coursework if you have a relatively clear goal in mind for an advanced degree. Besides, you might eventually work for an employer who will help you pay for a degree."

-Kerri Day Keller, director of Career and Employment Services

"I married in college as a junior, but I chose to have children five years after graduation. I was an honor student as an undergraduate, but no one encouraged me or told me to go on for higher education. Professors and teachers assumed that just because I had married as a junior, I would have a family. But I think you can do both. For women, there was always a sense that you became a career woman or a family woman. Follow your dreams — you can do both."

-Betsy Bergen, professor of family studies and human services

"For undergraduates, I hope they consider going on for graduate or advanced education, which is especially true in the sciences. Certainly these days, it is needed if you are going to end up in a position that will be significant in terms of income and being more than just a technician. Today's master's is like a bachelor's degree when I graduated [as an undergraduate in 1966]."

-Thomas Roche, distinguished professor of biochemistry and president of the University Distinguished Professor Group

"I wish I had taken more ethics coursework if I'd known how important ethics is to the business world. Also, I have learned how important it is that learning does not stop with an undergraduate degree but it continues throughout one's professional life."

-Diane Swanson, founding chair of the Business Ethics Education Initiative and associate professor of management

"Remember to save money for future bowl games and men's and women's National Collegiate Athletic Association tournaments"

-Pat Bosco, dean of student life

Dress for a professional lifestyle

"I don't understand how a woman can leave the house without fixing herself up a little — if only out of politeness. And then, you never know, maybe that's the day she has a date with destiny. And it's best to be as pretty as possible for destiny."

COURTNEY LAIR

Coco Chanel, in perhaps one of my favorite quotes, scrupulously addresses the art of presenting oneself — a subject of utmost concern for anyone upon entering the job market.

For those who are about to embark on the next phase in their lives, one must never underestimate the importance of appearance, especially when it comes to making first impressions. Looking professional and polished in both attire and grooming is crucial for an interview, internship or a newly-landed job.

Dress code specifics are likely to vary by geographic region, industry and company, so be sure to ask your employer or observe your coworkers before investing in an entirely new wardrobe. In the meantime, here is a list of general guidelines that have been established to address the most basic situations regarding dressing professionally.

Whatever your post-graduation plans may be, keep in mind these general guidelines that will have you looking and feeling your best. Dressing the part will help you convey to others that you are comfortable with yourself in a new environment.

Tips to dress well:

- It is always better to be overdressed than underdressed.
- Clothing must always be neat, clean and pressed.
- Nothing looks worse than ill-fitting clothes. Whether they are too baggy or too tight, spend the extra money to get them tailored.
- Be sure your hair and nails are neatly groomed.
- Use jewelry, makeup, perfume and aftershave to a minimum.

A dark, solid-colored suit is a professional wardrobe essential for both men and women. Ties with small patterns, button-down oxford shirts and conservative dress shoes are also appropriate attire for the workplace.

Essential Items:

- A classic suit in a dark solid color with an impeccable fit is definitely a good investment. A single-breasted, two-piece wool suit is preferred and will last for years. For women, a knee-length skirt is a more feminine and a traditional alternative to pants.
- Polished, conservative dress shoes — Dr. Martens absolutely do not count. Closed-toe shoes with a fairly low heel are the most appropriate for women.
- Dress shirts and button-down oxfords can be either classic in French blue or white, or more contemporary by adding a splash of color like magenta or lavender.
- Dark socks should be worn to coordinate with your suit or shoes. White socks look completely out of place in the business environment.
- For men, ties in solids or small, conservative patterns are considered appropriate.
- Accessories should be kept to a minimum. However, cuff links and tie pins for men add a dash of personality, as does delicate jewelry for women.
- Banana Republic, Brooks Brothers, Nordstrom, J.Crew and Ann Taylor are all excellent places to find professional attire in the Kansas City area. Borck Brothers in Seth Child Commons in Manhattan also has a wide selection.

Senior's love of music becomes career path

By Tessa French
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Some K-State students can shape their future based on their greatest interests in life.

Addi Foster, senior in music education, has done just that. After a string instrument presentation in sixth grade, Foster said she fell in love with the violin. It has been a big part of her life ever since.

"It's what I always wanted to do and what I was best at," she said.

Foster said she played in orchestra and band and sang in choir throughout her high school and junior college careers. Once she arrived at K-State, she began taking private violin lessons and played in the K-State Symphony Orchestra. Her lifetime goal is to teach music.

"I originally wanted to teach secondary school because I had the most experience in it," Foster said. "Then as I observed elementary education, I realized that my personality fits best with younger students."

"I can relate to them easier, and you can see more benefit when you're teaching them. They're more of a sponge, more receptive."

Foster said a source of inspiration is a student teaching position she held at a small elementary school at the beginning of this semester.

While at K-State, she said she has been a part of Phi Theta Kappa — an honor society of two-year colleges — the Collegiate Music Educators National Conference and the K-State student chapter of American String Teachers Association.

Foster's violin instructor Cora Cooper, professor of music, said Foster is hard-working.

"She didn't have some background in terms of being from a big city, but she worked really hard at opening up her perspective to what is out there in the musical world," Cooper said. "It was sometimes challenging, but she rose to the challenge."

Foster said she is from a small southeastern Kansas town and plans to move back home after graduating this weekend.

She said her husband has a dairy business there with his parents, and she has been searching, unsuccessfully thus far, for a job in the area.

"It hasn't been discouraging until lately," she said. "I haven't found anything yet, but I'm applying for a substitute teacher license and plan on starting my own studio to give individual lessons."

Foster said her ideal would be to have a part-time position in elementary music education which would allow time for her private studio and family.

She is finding, however, that when rare music positions are available, they are full-time.

"She'll be a very good teacher, partly because she's had to work through things herself, and she knows how to get things done and work through problems," Cooper said.

Looking back on her years at K-State, Foster said her classmate with Carlita Pederson, instructor of music, were some of her best experiences.

"She had a great perspective on elementary music, and we could observe and help," Foster said.

Overall, she said the Department of Music at K-State is challenging.

"For me it was very difficult," Foster said. "The reason was because in music we have to learn education classes, and then learn everything about music and teaching K through 12. We also get certified to teach band orchestra or chorus."

Cooper said Foster's senior recital performance was one of her greatest accomplishments as she was able to overcome stage fright with which she had previously struggled.

"She's done extremely well," Cooper said. "She'll be a great teacher and hopefully will help build a program around there and bring that to more people."

Seniors plan for graduation, weddings

By Melissa Brownlee
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Graduating from college can be stressful. Planning a wedding can be stressful. Now add the two together.

"It's overwhelming," Katherine Goodman, senior in elementary education, said.

Goodman will graduate from K-State this weekend and move to the Kansas City area to student teach. Her fiancé has already graduated from K-State.

The couple chose to plan their wedding close to graduation because they wanted to wait until they had both graduated because of insurance reasons. Also,

Goodman did not want to plan a wedding during her first year of teaching.

Goodman said it is hard to find time for studying for finals, making wedding decisions and going to premarital counseling, but she and her fiancée are enjoying the busyness.

"We're both having a good attitude and not letting it be too stressful," she said.

Derek Foote, management information systems, will also graduate this semester. He and fiancée Emilee Belknap, senior in dietetics, are planning a wedding for July 8, 2006.

Foote said he is moving to Wichita after graduation, so the couple will commute each weekend to plan for the wedding. He said their wedding planning has not been too stressful because he and Belknap have 10 months to plan and their families are helping.

Tyler Hands, senior in milling sciences, said he is starting to plan his wedding to Amanda Altwegg, K-State graduate, while preparing to graduate this weekend. Although the two have only been dating for a year, they are ready to get married as soon as possible.

"When you know, you know,"

Hands said. "She is who I want to be with. I'm done looking."

Hands said it has been hectic at times, balancing classes with graduation and wedding plans, but he is only in charge of coordinating the photographer and the florist.

Hands and Altwegg will move to Cedar Rapids, Iowa, after graduation because Hands found a job there. His employer has worked around Hands' graduation and wedding plans, helping the couple find a house, a teaching position for Altwegg and a church.

Senior plans to open jewelry store

By Kaley Lyon
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

When Chris Wedel came to K-State as a freshman in fall 2000, his reasons were simple.

An Americus, Kan., native, he wanted to get away from home without being too far away to go back for a weekend visit.

He also had several high school friends attending K-State.

Five years later, he said he cannot believe the time has gone by so quickly, or that he will be graduating from K-State in just a few weeks.

"It's bittersweet," Wedel said. "For most of the year, I was realizing, 'Oh my God, I'm graduating in December.' And now it's only a month away."

Wedel originally came to K-State as a computing and information sciences major, but soon realized computer programming wasn't for him.

He said he decided to change his major to metalsmithing and jewelry in 2002.

He said he had already taken classes in metal work, and liked them, which is why he decided to major in this field.

Wedel said he is also close to six hours short of a digital design degree.

During his five years at K-State, Wedel said he played intramural basketball, volleyball and flag football for Moore Hall and has been a member of the Metalsmithing Society, of which he said he was secretary last year.

Wedel said he has worked at Commerce Bank, 727 Poyntz Ave., for the past two years, currently as a financial services assistant.

It was also during his K-State years that he became reacquainted with his fiancé, Kari Robidou, senior in graphic design.

The couple attended high school together, though they were a few grade levels apart.

"It was kind of funny, actually," Wedel said. "We met again by chance up here at Stampede."

The couple will be married at the First United Methodist Church in Americus, in a Sept. 23, 2006, ceremony. The couple has been dating for four years and became engaged on Sept. 24, 2005.

"We're definitely excited about Sept. 23," Robidou said. "We have a lot of planning to do."

In addition to an upcoming wedding, Wedel has career plans in the works. Following commencement, he said his plan is to take additional metal classes in Emporia, Kan., St. Louis, Mo., or the Kansas City area.

Ideally, Wedel would like to open up his own custom jewelry shop one day, although it would take at least five years, he said.

"I do mostly rings, some pendants," he said. "I don't like big gaudy things that spin around and can be seen a mile away. I do clean, simple designs."

Wedel will have about 12 pieces of work on display Dec. 5-9 at the Mark A. Chapman Art Gallery in Willard Hall.

This display is part of an undergraduate show in which graduating seniors submit the projects they have completed while at K-State.

It is a requirement for all art students to complete an exhibition during their last semester at K-State.

Wedel's work will be displayed alongside the work of Yvonne Cook, senior in fine arts, who also has several pieces of jewelry on display.

"Their work is quite different from each other," Elliot Pujol, professor of art, said. "Both of their work is small scale and they both have several jewelry items on display."

Wedel said he feels K-State has prepared him well for his future, and he is anxious to get on with his life.

However, he said there are certain aspects of college life that will be hard to leave behind.

"I will miss meeting new people and hanging out with my friends here at KSU," he said.

Chris Wedel, senior in fine arts, looks over a display of rings and other jewelry he made. Wedel's creations are on display in the Mark A. Chapman Art Gallery in Willard Hall through today.

TV survival

Former "Survivor: Guatemala" contestant Brandon Bellinger has returned to his family's farm after being the ninth person voted off the show during the 21 days of taping. Bellinger said he felt the reality of what happened was sometimes different than what was portrayed on television.

Brandon Bellinger went three weeks without looking at himself in the mirror and lost 15 pounds — all on national television.

The 22-year-old was the ninth contestant voted off of "Survivor: Guatemala," which was taped in mid-June.

Brandon is working on his family's farm in rural Manhattan, and he has traveled to Oklahoma and Missouri since the show aired.

There were no hard feelings with Brandon when he was voted off on day 21 of taping.

"I had already mentally prepared myself for getting voted off," he said. "You feel like you let yourself down and those back home down, but I guess you can't win them all."

Brandon said the most challenging aspect of the show was starvation.

"The whole time you're out there, all you can think and talk about is food," he said. "You also don't really realize how skinny you get until you get booted off and look at yourself in a mirror."

In addition to weight loss, Brandon said he also experienced some jungle rash on his hands. There were physical adjustments when Brandon was voted off the show, as well, including flu-like symptoms.

"When you get out of the game, your body has to re-adapt to the old lifestyle and food," he said. "Everyone went through it, but it was pretty bad."

Brandon said while he is still trying to figure out his future, it might involve traveling and getting to see the rest of the world.

"This whole 'Survivor' ride is over for the most part, and I need to start figuring out what's next in life," he said.

Brandon said he has gained community recognition for his appearance on "Survivor." An unknown gas station clerk surprised him after referring to him by first name after he stopped to get gas at 2 a.m.

One lesson Brandon learned on "Survivor" was Americans have a high standard of living.

"Even if you say you are a poor farmer, we have it pretty good compared to others in the world," he said. "We're living other people's paradise. For us, eating at McDonald's has become normal, but to others it's paradise."

Burns, Groene to advance issues

Ninety days and counting. Student Body President Michael Burns has about three months of his term left to accomplish the four pillars of his presidential platform.

Burns' and Vice President Grant Groene's spring 2005 campaign centered on creating online instructor and course evaluations through the Wildcat Information Network, starting workshops for graduate teaching assistants, developing a contracted tuition rate and establishing a restructured service fee to cover access to Career and Employment Services (CES), free transcripts and the graduation fee.

Alito hearings begin

Staff Reports
 KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Nomination hearings for Judge Samuel Alito started this week before the Senate Judiciary Committee.

Alito has been faced with questions regarding abortion, presidential powers and his interpretation of the law, the Associated Press reported.

He was scrutinized for comments he wrote in 1985 against the Roe v. Wade decision that were released by the National Archives recently.

Alito wrote that the government "should make clear that we disagree with Roe v. Wade and would welcome the opportunity to brief the issue of whether, and if so to what extent, that decision should be overruled."

Alito also defended his 1991 vote on spousal notification, saying women who seek abortions must confront their husbands of their intentions.

Media credibility suffers after inaccurate reporting of miner story

By Jonas Hogg
 KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

After several days of rescue efforts in the Sago Mine in West Virginia, media outlets nationwide broadcast that 12 miners had been found alive. Headlines such as "Miracle in West Virginia" and "Alive! Miners beat odds" proclaimed what was later found to be false.

This latest media blunder comes on the heels of accusations that media reports during Hurricane Katrina were exaggerated and sensationalized.

With media credibility damaged by inaccuracies, exaggerations and wrong information, some are wondering how to solve the problems that are plaguing modern news outlets.

Tom Grimes, professor of journalism and mass communications, said the advent of 24-hour news channels has created a race for headlines and reduces emphasis on fact checking and editor oversight.

Grimes said the commercialization of news has decreased the weight of the me-dia's role as a public service and put more of an emphasis on pleasing stockholders.

"Even with television, back in the 1950s and the 1960s, television news (emphasized) the first amendment objective; to help society perform its responsibilities better through discussion, debate and airing of public problems ... but we've almost entirely abandoned that now," he said.

Grimes said the nature of modern broadcast news is unappealing to many, and said some of his students have returned from broadcast internships disenfranchised.

"Who wants to be a part of a profession that is so sensationalistic, wrong so many times and just silly?" he said.

Little Apple New Year's

A record crowd of an estimated 12,000 people packed Moro Street in Aggieville for the third annual Little Apple New Year's Eve Celebration and Ball Drop on Dec. 31. Fox News Network cut away to the event several times during its New Year's Eve coverage, airing live shots of the crowd at different times of the celebration. Former K-State football coach Bill Snyder was the official button-pusher who dropped the ball, shaped like an apple, at midnight to bring in 2006.

EDWARDS REPLACES VERMEIL IN K.C.

The Kansas City Chiefs announced Herman Edwards, the New York Jets' former coach, as the organization's 10th coach Monday. Important news and events that happened during winter break

The deal to bring Edwards to Kansas City is reportedly worth $12 million over four years. The Chiefs gave New York a fourth-round draft pick as compensation.

PATRIOT ACT RENEWAL ANGERS CRITICS

Congress voted to extend the Patriot Act until Feb. 3, despite White House pressure to make the law permanent. Lawmakers voted only to extend the law, which would have expired Dec. 31. Democrats and some Republicans criticized the broad reach and possible civil liberty infringements the law poses. Civil liberty concerns were heightened when a New York Times article revealed President Bush authorized secret spying and monitoring of international phone calls and e-mails.

NYC SUBWAY WORKERS GO ON STRIKE

Millions of commuters were forced to walk to work when New York City transit workers went on strike, halting subways. The Local 100 of the Transport Workers Union's 33,700 members went on strike for the first time in 25 years, demanding wage increases and improved health coverage. The walk-out stalled the city for three days beginning Dec. 20 and ended with continuing negotiations.

TEXAS WINS NATIONAL CHAMPIONSHIP

Behind 467 total yards from quarterback Vince Young, the Texas Longhorns upended No. 1 Southern California 41-38 in the Rose Bowl to win the national championship on Jan. 4. With 19 seconds left and Texas behind 38-34, Young scrambled eight yards for the winning touchdown, giving Texas its first national championship since 1969. The loss ended USC's 34-game winning streak and knocked the Trojans from the top spot of the Associated Press poll for the first time in 33 consecutive polls.

SHARON SUFFERS ANOTHER STROKE

Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon is in critical but stable condition after having a massive stroke Jan. 4, his second in the past month. Doctors are slowly waking the 77-year-old prime minister from a medically induced coma he has been in since his stroke. After three surgeries to stop bleeding in his brain, Sharon has slight movement in his arms and right leg.

TO THE POINT Smoking ban violates rights of Mercy visitors

On Jan. 1, all Mercy Health Center campuses became tobacco and smoke-free. This means employees, patients and visitors are not allowed to smoke or use any form of tobacco on any Mercy campus. Mercy personnel cited past complaints of walking through smoke as grounds for the policy, as well as the health of patients.

The policy is a bad move because there is an exception to the rule. Patients in the psychiatric ward may smoke and use tobacco outside Mercy facilities. Also, the policy does not have any fines or legal action for those who disobey it.

For some, smoking and tobacco use provides relief in stressful situations that might arise in a hospital.

As an alternative to the tobacco and smoke-free policy, Mercy should consider a 30-foot policy similar to K-State's smoking policy. It would require tobacco users to not come within 30 feet of signed entrances while smoking or using other forms of tobacco.

This policy would allow patients and visitors to use tobacco within a reasonable jurisdiction of Mercy facilities.

Although the ban benefits a majority of those at the hospital, it still infringes on the rights of others.

Capitol Hill education 'Syriana' provokes questions about government

After seeing "Syriana," a thriller about politics in international oil trade, there are many questions I've asked myself.

First, is the government hiding things from us? Of course, the obvious answer must be yes, and it might even be justified not to be totally candid with the American public.

But when it comes down to it, there are two things that make the government responsible for acting honestly and openly with their operations. The officials in Washington, D.C., must remember they are spending trillions of dollars of our money through taxes.

If we have to, by law, give the government a portion of our profits every year, we should be allowed to know what we are funding.

There are supposed "public records" of where the money goes, but we are getting deeper and deeper into debt, which has increased greatly because of the Iraq war. After cutting a third of funding for college student loans and decreasing the budgets of several other programs to "fight terrorism," it is becoming more difficult to trust the government and approving of what they do with our money.

Currently, it seems like everything in the news is about the battles against terrorism in Iraq.

As the war winds down, U.S. troops are now trying to help the Iraqi government build a democracy. This might not be the best of ideas, considering Iraq (and other Middle Eastern countries) are not used to this type of system.

However, the American government needs to put aside its thirst for world power and realize where many Americans really want to put their money.

These funds should not go toward war and democratic conversion.

Instead, they should be given to education, health care and other internal, not international, programs. America is the leader of the free world, and we are in a position to help the less fortunate in other countries.

Instead, we need to take care of our own citizens before gallivanting all over the world to repair other countries' political systems.

In addition to letting the American people know where our money is going, politicians have to remember their actions are representing all of us as a nation and as a people in general.

A lot of people have no idea what is going on in the world, and they don't seem to realize how important it is to keep up on what is happening.

In all actuality, while it is so easy to whine about the world we live in, it is useless to complain about policies or commend certain government leaders without being knowledgeable of the background issues.

It is so easy to take 10 minutes to read a newspaper or look up CNN on the Internet.

Well-informed and educated people are so much more respectable because they have information to back up their opinions.

People should be able to trust their leaders. But even though the United States is a democratic nation which elects our political officials, it doesn't always mean they should be the all-seeing authority on national and international policies. Questioning the government is perfectly natural. It has so much power, that it is our duty as Americans to be well-read about the government's influence over its citizens and the actions in other countries.

Editor introduces anatomy of opinion page

First of all, I would like to welcome all the new students to our university and welcome back all the old. My name is Zach and I'll be your opinion tour guide for this semester's trip.

Now, I'm going to let you in on how this whole thing works to make things run a little more smoothly.

Over there on the left-hand side of the page, you will see an editorial board. This daily editorial is discussed by the Collegian's editors and is decided by their majority opinion.

In the middle here, we have two opinion columns written by K-State students. These columns reflect the beliefs of the writer, not the Collegian. I have been working on making sure these writers are fair, balanced and represent as many points of view as possible.

ZACHARY T. ECKELS

If you feel like a writer needs to hear your voice, there is an e-mail address you can use to send them to me. I will make sure the writer has a chance to read your thoughts. However, writers are forbidden to respond to letters or e-mails in regards to content published in the Collegian.

If you wish to let the whole campus know your ideas, you can get a letter printed.

No matter how good they are, though, we can't guarantee they will ever be printed. To do this, we prefer you just bring in a written copy with some form of identification. You also can e-mail us your letters to letters@pub.ksu.edu.

Now for everyone's favorite part of this page, found at the bottom, the Kansas State Collegian Campus Forum. It is my job to listen to call after call and type your wonderful drunken slurs into legible quotes.

Sure, there's the obvious written rules you can see printed out below. But, to give your comments the best chance at being printed, I thought I would run you through exactly how the process works.

If something appears to violate one of the written rules in the Forum, I will have no choice but to delete it and move on to the next message. I cannot simply leave out the f-bomb you dropped in the middle of the funniest thing I've heard all day.

If you cuss, the whole thing is deleted.

I'm also not going to listen to a call 50 times in order to find out what you are mumbling about. If I cannot understand you, I will just delete the message and go on to the next call.

Third, Chuck Norris is not that great of a guy. Has nobody watched his clips on Late Night with Conan O'Brien? Norris is just a horrible actor who can kick very high.

Although I wish I could, I will not delete these comments. I just had to get that off my chest.

Well, that's the end of our tour for the day. I look forward to this page bringing you new ideas and relevant information. If it's not living up to your expectations, don't be afraid to share your thoughts through one or more of the methods mentioned above.

Zachary T. Eckels is a senior in print journalism. Please send your comments to opinion@pub.ksu.edu.

WRITE TO US

The Collegian enthusiastically welcomes letters to the editor. They have an important function as readers' perspectives to the Collegian and provide the opinion page with a variety of views. Oftentimes, student and faculty voices are overlooked on campus, and letters to the editor, along with the Campus Forum, are outlets for everyone's opinions to be heard.

Letters can be hand-delivered to the newsroom by the author. Upon delivery, the author will be asked for photo identification. Letters also can be e-mailed to letters@pub.ksu.edu or mailed to Kedzie 116, c/o Zach Eckels, opinion editor or Leann Sulzen, editor in chief.

The author's phone number and e-mail address must be included on these submissions but will not be published with the letter. They are required for the opinion editor to contact the author with any questions or comments concerning the letter.

Human ecology announces new interim dean

By Kelsey Childress
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

K-State officials recently announced Virginia Moxley has been named interim dean of the College of Human Ecology.

According to a press release from Provost M. Duane Nellis, Moxley, professor of human ecology, has assumed the position of interim dean of the college.

Moxley has many responsibilities during her time as temporary dean of the college. Along with representing the college and overseeing fundraising efforts and budgeting, she will work with department heads and alumni, which is what she said is most important to her.

Being in this leadership position is a matter of setting of cultures so faculty and students can do their best work, Moxley said.

She has had 20 years of experience as an associate dean at K-State and Emporia State University. According to the College of Human Ecology, she was named senior associate dean for scholarship and research in 2005. Moxley has additionally served as a department interim head within the college and has been a department chair at Emporia State.

Moxley also co-founded and is the co-director of K-State's Institute for Academic Alliances, which began in 2004.

Her involvement in many programs is strengthened by the praise and support she has received for her appointment as interim dean.

"She is an excellent leader and listener," Karen Pence, assistant dean of the college, said. "She has a vision of where we should be — she sees the big picture."

The process for deciding either a permanent or interim dean is thorough, Moxley said. A candidate can either be nominated or personally apply for the open position. While the ultimate decision is left up to the provost and president, she said, there are smaller steps that lead to being appointed as dean of the college.

First, after completing two applications, the candidate is reviewed by an eight-person screening committee to determine whether they are eligible for the position, Moxley said. If the person qualifies, there is an appointed meeting time for faculty, students and staff to give concerns and feedback about the candidate.

Moxley said the screening committee then reviews the feedback it receives and decides whether to recommend the candidate to the provost.

"Dr. Moxley has a range of excellent qualities that will serve the college well during this interim appointment," Nellis said.

In addition to Moxley's appointment, there also are a few faculty positions to fill within the college, and Moxley said she also plans to keep the fundraising and development initiative with the K-State Alumni Association thriving.

Others said they see her determination to make the college the best it can be.

"The college has a lot of momentum going in a number of different areas," Pence said. "She will keep this momentum going."

Moxley said she is excited about the new position.

"I have been an undergraduate administrator for many years, but I think I need to try out the position of interim dean before I decide how I really feel about it," she said.

Wildcats looking for redemption

By Matthew Girard
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Moving on is what the K-State Wildcats hope to do tonight against the Texas A&M Aggies.

Although the Wildcats (11-2, 1-1) shot a dismal 29 percent from the floor in its 26-point (68-42) loss to Missouri on Saturday, players and coaches refuse to focus on their first Big 12 Conference loss.

"It's easier said than done," said junior Twiggy McIntyre, the only Wildcat in double figures (14) against Missouri. "You just don't even talk about it and dust off and get ready for the next opponent."

Instead, the Wildcats are focusing on attacking the Aggies' (12-3, 1-1) defense — which has allowed only 53.5 points per game in Big 12 Conference play — through the post.

"A&M is a very good team and is someone that we have to

MLB | Sutter named to Hall of Fame; 2 denied

NEW YORK — Bruce Sutter was elected to the Hall of Fame on Tuesday, just the fourth relief pitcher given baseball's highest honor.

Sutter, the first pitcher elected to the hall with no career starts, was listed on 76.9 percent of the ballots cast by 10-year members of the Baseball Writers' Association of America. The split-finger pioneer collected 400 of a record 520 ballots.

Players needed 390 votes (75 percent) to gain election. Boston Red Sox slugger Jim Rice fell 53 short, finishing second with 337 votes (64.8 percent), one ahead of reliever Goose Gossage.

Sutter was on the ballot for the 13th time, the first player elected so late since Ralph Kiner in 1975.

SPT | OSU alumnus sets record with $165M gift

STILLWATER, Okla. — Billionaire alumnus Boone Pickens will donate $165 million to Oklahoma State, the largest single gift given to an NCAA athletic program.

The amount surpasses the $100 million Las Vegas casino owner Ralph Engelstad gave the University of North Dakota in 1998. Only half that sum was initially intended to build a hockey arena, but the project eventually consumed the entire gift.

Pickens' donation is aimed at creating an athletic village north of the football stadium that already bears the name of the 77-year-old Texas oil tycoon. The money will go toward completing the upgrade of Boone Pickens Stadium and fund changes in a 20-year master plan, yet to be approved by university regents.

OLY | Nardiello's plea denied by New York court

NEW YORK — A New York Supreme Court justice upheld U.S. skeleton coach Tim Nardiello's suspension Tuesday, denying his request to join his Olympics-bound team at this weekend's World Cup competition in Germany.

Essex County Supreme Court Judge James Dawson issued his decision by fax one day after Nardiello went to court in Elizabethtown, N.Y., seeking reinstatement.

Nardiello, placed on paid administrative leave Dec. 31 by the U.S. Bobsled and Skeleton Federation after two sexual harassment complaints were made against him, is expected to continue appealing with hopes of coaching the U.S. team at the Turin Olympics next month.

He's scheduled to be interviewed by U.S. Olympic Committee officials later this week. The USOC has the final say on which athletes and coaches compose its delegation for the Turin Games.

Even if the USOC doesn't issue Nardiello a credential, he still could coach at the Olympics, although not around official American soldiers.

Squad seeks improvement after track invitational

By Chris Carpenter
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The K-State track and field squad won 19 of 31 events this weekend at the KSU Invitational, but Coach Cliff Rovelto was far from pleased with his team.

"There was some that was good, but I think we've got a long ways to go," he said. "These meets that are early, with kids coming right off of a break, it's hard to evaluate — overall, a lot of bad performances."

In K-State's spring opener, the Wildcat women won nine event titles, and the men added 10 more. Even though the Cats won the majority of their events, this meet was not a fair assessment of his team's abilities, Rovelto said.

"A lot of these kids just got back from break and didn't have access to facilities to keep in top shape," he said. "That excuses our field performance more than our track."

Freshman Scott Sellers made a strong debut as a collegiate competitor, beating out senior Kyle Lancaster by two inches in the high jump.

"That was a great way to start off the season," Sellers said. "I know that Kyle and I are going to be having a lot of fun this year competing against others and each other."

Sellers, a third-place finisher for Track and Field News' National Male Indoor High School Athlete of the Year competition in 2005, finished with a jump of 7-2 1/2 to Lancaster's 7-0 1/2.

"That's a pretty decent height to clear this early," Rovelto said. "He is a really talented kid. When it's all said and done, he may be as good as any jumper we've ever had here, and that is saying something."

Two weight throwers also were impressive at the KSU Invitational.

Senior Coby Cost won his 22nd career weight throw title at the meet with a distance of 66-5 3/4. It was the second time this season Cost reached the NCAA's provisional qualifying standard.

For the women, junior Laci Heller won the 10th weight throw title of her career with a distance of 64-1 3/4, which also makes her a provisional qualifier.

Senior Christian Smith broke a 15-year-old meet record by timing in at 1:50.49 seconds in the men's

Cats look for 1st Big 12 win tonight against Nebraska

By Angie Hanson
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The weight of tonight's matchup against the Nebraska Cornhuskers got heavier Saturday, when K-State lost its Big 12 Conference opener against Iowa State, 72-70, in Ames, Iowa.

The weight got even heavier when the Cornhuskers handed the No. 12 Oklahoma Sooners a two-point upset in both teams' Big 12 opener Saturday afternoon.

"I do (think this game has more leverage) on both accounts," Coach Jim Wooldridge said. "They've (Nebraska) probably grown more confident, and on our account, through their win against Oklahoma and Marquette earlier in the season, we understand this is a very fine basketball team."

When the Wildcats (9-3, 0-1) take on the Cornhuskers at 7 tonight in Bramlage Coliseum, they are looking to defend their flawless home-court record and halt a talented Nebraska squad.

Although the Cats tallied their third road loss of the season against the Cyclones, a few positives emerged from the defeat.

Sophomore transfer David Hoskins scored a career-high 25 points, and junior Cartier Martin maintained his scoring ability with 21 points, to help the Cats battle back from a 13-point deficit.

K-State also notched a season-best 57 percent shooting (27-47)

Texans need to pass on Bush; one player alone can't fix their mess

The time for underclassmen to announce whether they will forgo their senior season for the NFL Draft is Friday.

Although Heisman Trophy winner Reggie Bush has not stated his intentions, he is all but a lock to leave USC and begin his professional career.

ANTHONY MENDOZA

Bush likely will be the No. 1 selection by the Houston Texans come draft day, but by choosing him, the fledgling franchise will be making the wrong decision.

Taking Bush with the No. 1 pick would bring a buzz to Houston that has not existed in the history of the franchise, but long term it would not be the best move to make, with the way the team is constructed.

The Texans need to trade their top selection and move down in the draft.

Houston needs all the help it can get. The Texans need someone to protect their $8 million investment, former No. 1 pick quarterback David Carr, who they just picked up a contract option on.

Carr leads the league in being sacked on a regular basis, and if the Texans move down in the draft, they will be able to find help. D'Brickashaw Ferguson, an offensive tackle from Virginia, is the best available lineman in the draft and is being predicted to go in the top four.

With the New York Jets' struggles this season and the New York Giants taking headlines from their co-tenants in the state of New York, the Jets would be willing to make a splash on a big-time flashy running back like Bush, especially with running back Curtis Martin coming off his first major injury of his career and logging up years.

It could be an instance where the Jets fans do not boo their No. 1 pick at the podium as he holds up his jersey for the first time.

If the Jets don't want to swing the deal, there is the second choice, the one the Texans could steal the most picks from for the right to the top selection, the Oakland Raiders.

"Beauty and the beat"

Album review by Mark Sibilla

Boston MC, Edan's second album, "Beauty and the Beat," is deeply rooted in the past, while it ambitiously branches out to the future. Edan is to music what an archaeologist is to an untouched African savannah. That is, Edan has a sharp ear for unearthing long-forgotten samples and mixing them with simple break-beats and a liberal peppering of synthesizers and echoplex.

Using his kaleidoscopic vision, Edan impressively improves upon his first LP, "Primitive Plus." He not only borrows from hip-hop's past, but '60s psychedelia, soul and '70s prog-rock as well, to create the best non-Kanye rap album of 2005.

The album opens, appropriately, with a "Polite Meeting." The song is a psychedelic collage of record scratches and static-filled samples that give the listener an idea of what to expect. Its keyboard lines swirl and build before it dissipates into a sample that sounds as if it was taken from live recordings at Woodstock.

"Funky Voltron," the first proper track, mixes a Moog synthesizer and a sample taken from the relics of early-'60s girl-groups. Along with rapper Insight, Edan playfully skips rhymes over soul-horns and a funky bass line.

"I See Colors" features a loop borrowed from Prince Paul and, of course, plenty of trippy echoplex and synthesizers to create a track that bubbles with life. The crackling sounds of needle static gives the album a feeling of timelessness. It is no coincidence that Edan mentions LSD within one of his lines as the entire record has the flow and feeling of a strong drug-induced trip.

Edan pays homage to past hip-hop masters while placing himself along their sides on "Fumbling Over Words That Rhyme." Skillfully slipping in and out of the beat, Edan creates a hook from a tongue-in-cheek sample that sounds as if chipmunks were singing the track's title.

The instrumentation on "Beauty" sounds as if the London Symphony ingested psychedelic mushrooms before their concert; "The Science of the Two" is another example of Edan and Insight's dexterous lyrical interplay.

"Promised Land" ends the album and brings the surrealist bent of the LP to its apex. It is a well-earned boast track that finds Edan boldly pronouncing his skills in a fantastic manner. Other rappers name-drop Cadillac cars or Jacob watches, but Edan is content "putting his name on the asteroid belt" and "wearing the Prime Meridian as a wrist band."

"Beauty and the Beat" finds this young rapper and producer enlightened and he knows his place in hip-hop's canon. With only two albums, Edan is proving that he deserves to be mentioned and placed amongst the hip-hop elite.

THE 'NEWLYWEDS' OFFICIALLY CALL IT QUITS

Jessica Simpson filed for divorce from her husband of three years, Nick Lachey, on Dec. 16. The couple's first two years of marriage were documented for a MTV reality show, "Newlyweds."

The show went on to spur MTV into its highest-rated year in company history. According to a press release from Viacom, MTV's parent company, "Newlyweds" helped make MTV the No. 1 rated basic cable network among viewers ages 12 to 24.

Despite the success of the reality show and in light of constant public scrutiny, Simpson and Lachey announced over Thanksgiving they were splitting up.

"After three years of marriage, and careful thought and consideration, we have decided to part ways. This is the mutual decision of two people with an enormous amount of respect and admiration for each other. We hope that you respect our privacy during this difficult time," according to Simpson's legal papers filed in the Los Angeles Superior Court.

In the last year, Simpson banked more than $30 million from various outlets, including record sales and a role in this summer's hit, "The Dukes of Hazzard."

LIFE WITHOUT HARRY POTTER

J.K. Rowling began preparations in December for her seventh and final installment of the Harry Potter series.

According to a posting made by Rowling on her Web site, "I contemplate the task with mingled feelings of excitement and dread, because I can't wait to get started, to tell the final part of the story and, at last, to answer all the questions (Will I ever answer all of the questions? Let's aim for most of the questions); and yet it will all be over at last and I can't quite imagine life without Harry."

The sixth book in the series, "Harry Potter and the Half-Blood Prince," came out last summer, and the fourth movie, "Harry Potter and the Goblet of Fire," was in theaters in November.

Rowling said she hopes to begin writing the final book in February.

"OLD SCHOOL" ACTOR DIES AT 86

Patrick Cranshaw, best known for his role in the 2003 comedy "Old School," passed away from natural causes in late December.

Cranshaw's career spanned nearly 50 years and included roles in "Bonnie and Clyde" and "Herbie: Fully Loaded." His other credits include hit television shows "Mork & Mindy" and "The Dukes of Hazzard."

Cranshaw played elderly frat boy Joseph "Blue" Palasky, in "Old School" starring Luke Wilson and Will Ferrell. His character dies of an apparent heart attack while wrestling two topless women in a tub of personal lubricant. At his funeral, Ferrell's character sings "Dust in the Wind" and cries out, "You're my boy, Blue!"

stroke in 2004. Clark was unable to host the New Year's festivities last year for the first time since 1972.

Following a year of rehabilitation, Clark was able to sit through "New Year's Rockin' Eve" with little notice of the stroke despite trouble with his speech.

HOWARD STERN DEBUTS ON SIRIUS RADIO

On Monday, long-time controversial talk-show host, Howard Stern, began his five-year contract for Sirius Satellite radio. Stern previously had a morning talk-show for Infinity Broadcast and was nationally syndicated, earning more than $100 million in annual advertising revenues.

The move to Sirius came in the aftermath of the Federal Communications Commission crackdown on offensive media content following last year's Super Bowl "wardrobe malfunction." Stern's new talk-show promises to continue the tradition of raunchy material.

His last FM radio broadcast was Dec. 16th in front of thousands of fans who gathered outside his New York City studio.

Hospital visitor complaints cause Mercy to go smoke-free

By Adrienne DeWeese
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

All Mercy Health Center campuses became tobacco and smoke-free as of Jan. 1.

The new policy is in place because of past visitor complaints of having to walk through smoke, Judy Wagner, vice president of mission services, said.

The signs at all entrances read "For everyone's better health, all of our grounds and buildings are smoke and tobacco-free."

For employees who smoke, Mercy is offering to purchase nicotine patches and prescriptions from the Occupational Health Service Department until the end of June.

Wagner said the only exception to the rule is for patients in the psychiatric ward.

"A lot of them have a lot of psychological issues," she said. "Taking their smoking away from them can be overwhelming with their other issues."

Employees who break the rule will face action based on Mercy policy, and Mercy will contact a patient's physician to see what he or she can do to quit using tobacco.

Visitors of a patient who break the rule will be informed of their alternatives to tobacco use, Wagner said.

"It's about the approach and letting them know that we now have a policy that is smoke and tobacco-free," she said. "We're not singling out people, although that is how it is sometimes perceived."

Wagner said Mercy is not worried about losing employees because of the policy.

"It is possible, but we don't believe that it will necessarily happen to us," she said.

The previous policy required medical staff personnel to accompany a patient outside when smoking, said Joe Philipp, chief medical staff officer at Mercy.

"It was not a good use of personnel," he said. "We need them to take care of our patients."

Damaged wing grounds GlobalFlyer

The Virgin Atlantic Global Flyer, with pilot Steve Fossett, approaches the runway just before landing at the Salina Municipal Airport to complete the world record on March 3, 2005.

By Leann Sulzen
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Wing damage to the Virgin Atlantic GlobalFlyer could delay pilot Steve Fossett's attempt at another aviation record.

According to a Virgin Atlantic news release, a wing tip struck a fuel tank causing "considerable damage" to the wing. The damage postponed the plane's Friday flight from Salina to the Kennedy Space Center in Florida.

The GlobalFlyer will use a NASA runway in Florida for takeoff on "The Ultimate Flight" when Fossett attempts to set a new aviation distance record.

The flight was scheduled for early February, but might be postponed.

The GlobalFlyer is housed in a hangar at the Salina Municipal Airport and maintained by Virgin Atlantic crew members as well as K-State-Salina students.

K-State-Salina Dean of Technology and Aviation Dennis Kuhlman said repairs are going smoothly, but he has not been informed when departure for Florida will be rescheduled. "I expect some notification about it any day as far as their actual timing," he said.

Former governor to teach class

By Adam Monroe
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

One of the ways the Department of Political Science is working to enhance its program is by involving people who have been in the political arena at several different levels.

The department's newest addition, former Kansas governor John Carlin, is a practitioner of real world situations.

His knowledge and experience in politics could help students learn how to interact in that area, said Joseph Aistrup, head of the political science department.

One of the classes Carlin is teaching is Practical Politics, which Carlin said is designed to be a basic course to teach students some of the realities of politics.

"The class will look at case studies, which will focus primarily on the local political process," Carlin said.

"Hopefully students will be able to use this knowledge to benefit them in their business, church or academia, because they all involve politics," Carlin added.

Jeff Smith, senior in political science, said he thinks Carlin's experience will make him an asset to the department's students.

"I know his Practical Politics course offered next semester is based on grassroots campaigning, and he was very successful at that, so his knowledge will be an infinitely valuable resource," Smith said.

Panda Express' food, late hours boost sales

Joslyn Brown | COLLEGIAN
Becca Townsend, senior in social science, prepares a meal for a customer at the Panda Express.

By Jessi Hernandez
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

It appears K-State students like orange-flavored chicken.

Panda Express opened in the K-State Student Union Food Court last September and had a busy opening semester.

"It was great. We set out a budget every year, and we're above where we thought we'd be," Adam Setter, Panda Express manager, said.

Sam Loring, fifth year in architecture, said he was glad to have another option for Union dining.

"I think it's better than a lot of the other places, so it's going to get my business more often," he said.

Loring, and other students who find themselves haunting campus into the late hours of the day, will again be able to take advantage of Panda Express' later hours this semester.

It will be open from 10 a.m. to 7:30 p.m. Monday through Friday, and from 11 a.m. to 2 p.m. on Saturday.

Museum director to serve advisory role

By Christina Hansen
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Lorne Render, director of the Marianna Kistler Beach Museum of Art, will serve on the American Association of Museums Accreditation Program advisory group for 2006.

Out of hundreds of applicants nationwide, Render was chosen by the AAM as one of 30 members named to the advisory group this year.

Render said he was pleased when notified of his selection because he said he values the work its members accomplish.

"The accreditation program is very important," he said. "It shows a standard in our profession. Group members look at the accreditation process in place and look for better ways to serve museums."

A museum seeking accreditation must complete an application, a one-year self-study and receive several reviews and site visits from the AAM to determine whether it meets the group's standards.

According to the AAM Web site, more than 3,000 museums across the United States are currently accredited through its program. K-State's Beach Museum has been accredited since 2001.

Diana McCaustland, Beach Museum Board of Directors member, said the museum's accredited status and Render's selection to the advisory group signify the Beach Museum's quality.

"The staff is always working hard to create new programs and bring different types of art to the museum," she said. "A good appointment like that will bring attention to the museum, and hopefully bring more visitors."

The advisory group members are chosen to represent museums across the nation and provide input for accredited museums, as well as museums involved in the accreditation process.

Although Render will be juggling the responsibilities of two positions, he said his work in the advisory group would not affect his role as director of the Beach Museum.

"This position allows me to look at the accreditation processes in place, and find better ways to serve the Beach Museum," he said.

City officials expect Best Buy construction to begin soon

By Wendy Haun
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The initial phase of the downtown redevelopment project is set to begin with the construction of Best Buy.

The city commission approved the rezoning, which goes to the planning board in February, city manager Ron Fehr said. The goal is to have Best Buy completed by fall, Fehr said.

The store will be west of Tuttle Creek Boulevard and north of Leavenworth Street in a 30,000 square-foot building. There will be two other businesses in the area, but the names have not been finalized yet, Fehr said.

The redevelopment project will be on North Third and Fourth streets, and details about new businesses and Best Buy will be coming in future months, city commissioner Bruce Snead said.

The nearest Best Buy is in Topeka, and Fehr said having one in Manhattan will benefit the local economy.

"Many people shop in the Topeka store," he said. "Now they won't have to, and it will bring a considerable amount of sales to the community."

Best Buy will generate revenue for the city, said Lyle Butler, president of Manhattan Area Chamber of Commerce.

"We already know that people travel to make purchases in Topeka," Butler said.

"If we can keep business local, hire full and part-time help, it will generate a lot of sales tax revenue."

Shannon Powell, senior in psychology, said she shops for electronics and entertainment at local businesses. She said Best Buy should do well if it can compete.

"I think it'll be an improvement," she said. "They offer similar things, so if they have cheaper prices, they'll do good business."

MEN | Wildcats hope to prove conference worth against Nebraska

for the Wildcats in Ames, as the Wildcats historically lose by double digits on Cyclone turf.

Still, moments of greatness and a season-high 23 turnovers won't win games, Wooldridge said.

"There's no such thing as a moral victory," Wooldridge said. "When you play on the road, the basics of playing this game are amplified. You have to be poised and patient, and we were at times, but obviously we had moments where we lost our poise, turned the ball over, etc."

The Huskers are off to their best start in six seasons with an 11-3, 1-0 record.

K-State will have its hands full with the back-court combination of Joe McCray, who is averaging 10.9 points per game, and Jason Dourisseau, who is averaging 11.1 ppg. Wes Wilkinson has also established himself as a dominant presence down low, leading the Huskers with 12.8 ppg.

"They have excellent shooters on their team, along with that they're a good rebounding team, and they're defensive numbers are solid, as well," Wooldridge said.

K-State has won 10 of the last 11 games at Bramlage and six of the last 10 outings overall.

Despite Nebraska's surprise victory over Oklahoma, Martin said the Cats still feel they have the upper hand in tonight's game.

"We know Nebraska's a good team, but we're a good team like they are," Martin said. "They have to come here, so I think we have a good chance."

800-meter run. Smith almost met the NCAA provisional qualifying time of 1:50.10.

Still, as a whole, Rovelto was left unimpressed, though he said it was hard to tell as other schools haven't competed as much as K-State.

"You don't play defense in this sport," he said. "You just have control over what you do, and you can't slow anyone else down. From a team perspective, it would be speculation to say we're good or bad, as we haven't seen a lot of the other schools we compete against yet. But there is a lot of work to do."

With a meet at Arkansas

this weekend, Rovelto will find out more about his team quickly.

He said he knows the capabilities are there, but the team needs more consistency.

"The key to winning, for example, a conference championship isn't just your high placers, but also your lower placers, who might only score one or two points," he said. "Right now I don't see a lot of those, and that's alarming. Our standards are pretty high here, and it could be that other teams aren't any better than us, and we could be fine to finish among the top three or four, which is what we've come to expect for our teams here."

COLUMN | Houston has more to gain by trading Bush for picks

Randy Moss trade) and they might be willing to overpay for the chance to select Bush. The Raiders hold the No. 6 pick in the draft, where Ferguson might still be available, but not likely.

Houston can go in a different direction and build the team defense, either taking North Carolina State defensive end Mario Williams or Penn State defensive end Tamba Hali, the top two defenders available in the draft.

From there, Davis can work on his master plan of once again moving the Raiders, this time back to Los Angeles where the No. 5 Bush jerseys will no doubt be a hot item now that Kerry Collins does not have any use for the number.

In the end, everyone wins.

Either the Jets or Raiders get the player they think will bring them back to being a contender within their division, and the Texans will begin to lay down the framework like the Dallas Cowboys did in the late '80s when they traded all-pro running back Herschel Walker to the Minnesota Vikings for players and draft picks. It led them to becoming a championship team in the '90s — a place one player is not capable of catapulting the Texans.

Not even Reggie Bush.

be just fine."

McIntyre said the outside shot won't carry the Wildcats through the season.

"We really have to focus on, when shots aren't falling, to really pay attention to getting the ball to our post players more," she said. "We can't live and die at the three-point line, which is what we've been doing the last couple of games."

Like K-State, Texas A&M won its conference opener but lost its first conference road game. Prior to losing to Texas Tech 56-55 on Saturday, the Aggies had won 10 consecutive games.

The Aggies are led by freshman Takkia Starks, who is averaging 11.8 points per game on 47 percent shooting, and sophomore Morenike Atunrase, who is averaging 12.2 ppg.

Texas A&M also leads the conference in turnover margin at +10.53 per game, a statistic Coach Deb Patterson is well aware of.

"They are a team that forces you into turnovers if you're not smart with the basketball," Patterson said. "We are going to have a team on the floor unlike any that our team has seen before."

The Wildcats might have fielded their largest defeat to a Big 12 opponent since a 29-point loss at Iowa State on Feb. 10, 2001, on Saturday against Missouri, but history is in K-State's corner.

K-State has won its last six games against the Aggies by an average of 15 points and have not lost in College Station, Texas, since 1998.

"It will be a huge motivation for them, and coach (Gary) Blair will pound on it," Patterson said of K-State's winning streak over the Aggies. "but for us I think we are more about the immediate challenge."

Sebelius budget has extras

By John Hanna
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

TOPEKA — Gov. Kathleen Sebelius proposed a budget Tuesday with something for all parts of state government, but it won't work if legislators shoe-horn in a big school funding plan without additional revenues.

The $11.7 billion spending plan to finance state government after July 1 assumes no major problem with education funding because Sebelius didn't anticipate details of a legislative audit. That document, released Monday, said the state needs at least an extra $400 million to meet a Kansas Supreme Court mandate for legislators to adequately fund public schools.

The lack of a big school finance plan cast doubt on the Democratic governor's proposals. House Appropriations Committee Chairman Melvin Neufeld even suggested Sebelius was trying to push lawmakers into raising taxes to benefit schools — something Republicans, who control the Legislature, generally oppose.

"It's pretty clear the Legislature probably won't leave without actually putting new money in education above what the current law is," Neufeld, R-Ingalls, said.

Trolley services possible in Manhattan

By Logan C. Adams
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Manhattan might regain something in common with San Francisco in the future if an anonymous investment group has its way.

The group wants to start a trolley transportation business in Manhattan. A test trolley gave free rides Dec. 31 to gauge public demand for such a service.

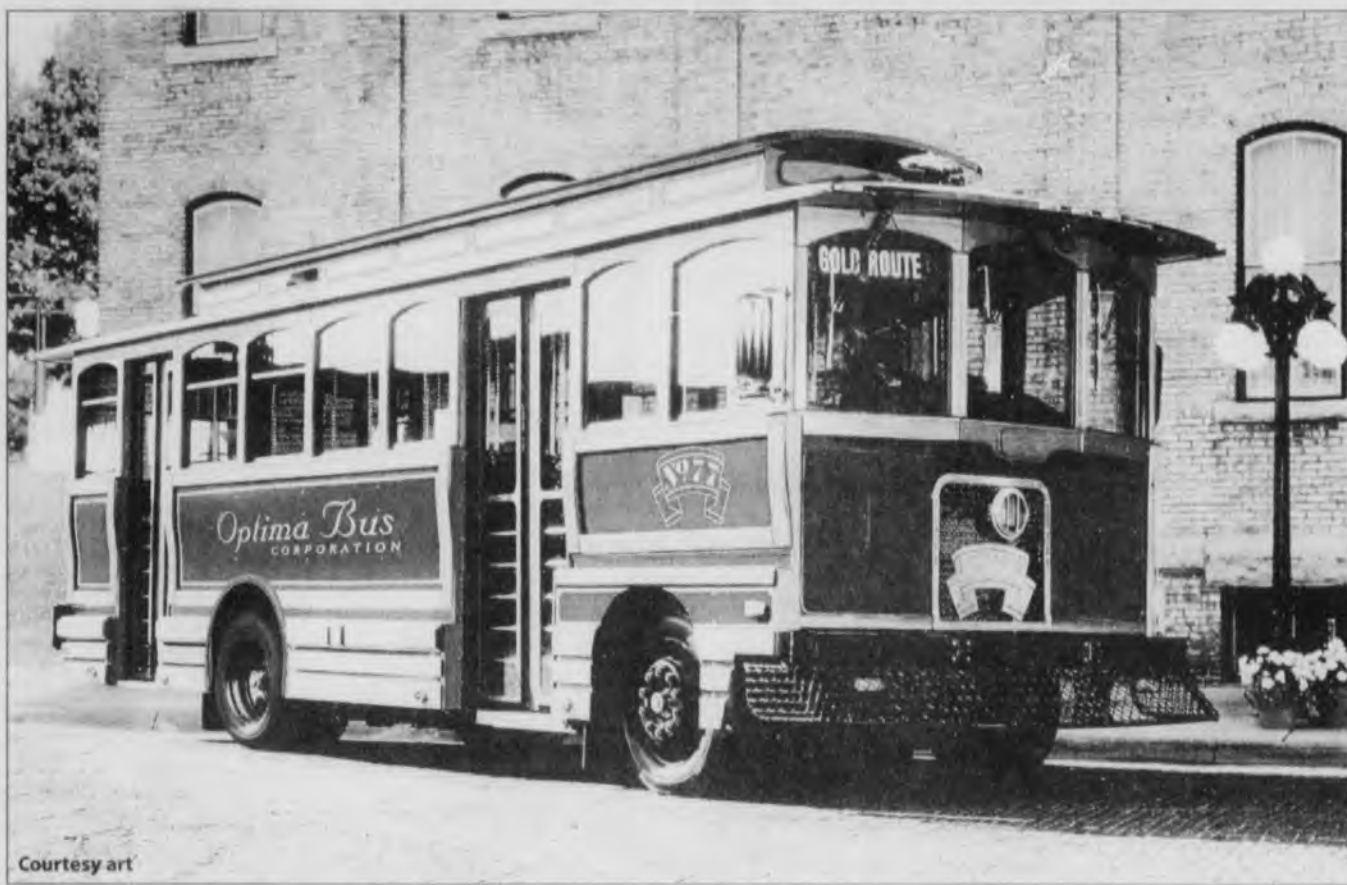

Kate Watson, Manhattan resident and co-founder of the Little Apple New Year's Eve celebration, is the only member of the group behind the enterprise who has publicly identified herself. She would not say how many investors are involved with the project.

Watson said there are no plans in place, and the group is only looking to find out if there's a market for such a service. She said group members will not identify themselves because none of them have made commitments.

The Manhattan test trolley was an American Heritage Streetcar provided by Optima Bus Corp., a Wichita-based bus manufacturer.

Steve Kratzer, the Optima marketing and business development representative who drove the trolley, said he counted 117 riders Dec. 31.

The trolley made its way back and forth from Aggieville to downtown Manhattan and back, taking about 15 minutes to complete a circuit.

Courtesy art

This was not the first time a trolley made its way through the city. An electric-powered, rail-riding trolley took riders from the train depot near downtown Manhattan to a stop on campus from 1909 through the 1920s, said Dan Walter, Aggieville historian and textbook manager at Varney's Book Store.

Watson said there is no agreement to purchase any trolleys from Optima. She said more will be known about potential plans next week after more data about the public response has been collected.

Between its seats and its standing room, the trolley is officially able to carry 47 people, according to information from Optima.

Watson said there are two basic orientations that work for a trolley system.

One is to have a published route between stops at several area locations, somewhat like a public transit system. The other option is to operate it as a charter service for events around Manhattan.

Watson said the set-route option would make stops possible on K-State's campus, in Fort Riley and in communities around Manhattan.

"We'd like to get involved, and we'd like to get them to tell us what the market value might be," she said, referring to K-State's administration.

Tom Rawson, K-State Vice President for Administration and Finance, said he has not heard from the investors but he would be open to discussing such a system.

Dean and Shirley Taylor, a Manhattan retired couple, boarded the trolley near Manhattan Town Center on Dec. 31 to take it for a test ride. Dean said he would be willing

Groene, senior in agronomy, said WIN infrastructure problems, including a vacancy in the director's position for most of fall 2005, have delayed the release of the online evaluations, but they will be available this semester.

Workshops for GTAs already are provided on campus, Burns said, but before the workshops can be improved or restructured, facilitators must determine how to increase attendance.

"The trick is getting graduate students to the workshops," Burns, senior in agricultural education, said.

A committee of eight students, three administrators and one faculty member are discussing and drafting a recommendation that ad-resses several tuition items, Burns said. By March 1, the recommendation, including a suggested tuition plan, will be presented to university administration.

"It's something that takes a lot of time to do all the research, but we're hoping to get things laid out so whoever comes in after us can take it and run with it," Groene said.

Brandon also learned survival is in one's state of mind.

"You'd be surprised what you can survive and what your body can adapt to," he said.

After being voted off the show, Brandon was sent off on a vacation by CBS with other cast members who had been voted off to an undisclosed location. The purpose of the vacation was for others to avoid finding out about the contestants who were voted off. Brandon also had an appearance on CBS' "The Early Show."

Brandon's term on "Survivor" has left him more proactive in meeting new people, said Steve Bellinger, Brandon's brother and senior in mechanical and nuclear engineering.

"When he left, he was more sheepish and calm. Now he's not afraid to talk to random people," Steve said. "It's interesting to see that effect."

Grimes said to remedy some of the problems, some people are speculating on subscription television news services. These stations would allow news to be less commercial, and to focus more on accurate reporting.

"The type of journalism that you used to see ... may return, but it may return as a for-pay subscription service on cable. Just like you pay for HBO, you pay for the kind of objective, professionally driven, carefully balanced, carefully thought through news that used to characterize a lot, not all, but a lot of American broadcast journalism in the '50s, '60s and '70s," he said.

The Supreme Court overturned his ruling.

Senators offered their opinions of the hearings.

"I think Judge Alito went farther than Chief Justice Roberts did," Sen. Arlen Specter, R-PA, said of abortion.

Sen. Charles Schumer, D-N.Y., said he was not impressed with Alito's responses.

"We're going to keep asking questions until we find out specific answers to how he feels about major issues confronting Americans today," he said.

Agency revises lease form

By Holly Smith
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The Housing and Credit Counseling Inc. recently revised a form allowing landlord and tenants to terminate a lease when certain rights are infringed upon.

The noncompliance form gives landlords the opportunity to list what actions need to be taken for the tenant to be in compliance and provides notice when the breach is not fixable, said Louise Kirkpatrick, tenant-landlord counselor for Housing and Credit Counseling Inc.

The notice of noncompliance replaces the 14-30 day notice, which indicated tenants have 14 days to remedy whatever violation they had committed or they would be evicted in 30 days.

There was confusion with the prior 14-30 day notice when law enforcement officials had to issue one type of notice and the landlord issued a different type of notice, said Robert Baker, consumer credit and tenant-landlord branch

Telecomm tapping raises concerns

By Lola Shrimplin
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Manhattan residents expressed mixed feelings regarding the Bush administration's tapping of telecommunications in prevention of terrorism since the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks.

Manhattan residents who are concerned their e-mail and phone calls are being monitored should not worry unnecessarily, said Craig Stapley, visiting assistant professor of political science.

"There's been wiretapping as long as there's been the technology to do it," Stapley said.

According to a Jan. 1 CNN report, Congress failed to renew the anti-terror legislation in the USA Patriot Act before it recessed in December. The possibility of renewal was extended to one month.

During Tuesday's Senate Judiciary Committee hearing, Supreme Court Justice nominee Samuel Alito said it is the responsibility of the courts to protect the rights of individuals against the government, according to a Wednesday CNN report.

K Corporate downsizing?

Long-time Kmart employees lose jobs as national chain's earnings continue to decrease

By Lacey D. Mackey
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

At least five long-time Kmart employees were fired Jan. 4 in what some say is a corporate downsize.

Kmart manager Jim Hobbs said Manhattan's store cannot comment on the situation.

Sandy Tuttle, Kmart employee for 23 years, said it seemed the company was getting rid of some high-paid employees and those with longevity in an attempt to help the corporation by downsizing.

Kmart Holding Corp. and Sears, Roebuck and Co. agreed to merge to form Sears Holding Corp. in November 2004.

Tuttle said she had been warned by fellow employees that layoffs were happening, but she was still shocked when she was called into the manager's office.

"Of course, I was emotional, and you could tell he felt bad," Tuttle said. "It wasn't his decision."

Joanna Heaslet, who was laid off after 26 years at Kmart, agreed that the manager was upset about letting his employees go.

"I have to say, he didn't want to fire me," she said. "It was the worst day of his life, because he didn't want to do that."

Heaslet said she had heard some things would be changing at the store but thought only employee hours would be cut.

"We knew there were going to be some changes, but we had no idea they were going to fire so many people," she said.

Heaslet said she took off a few days from work after the Christmas rush when she heard fellow employees say layoffs were happening.

Heaslet called her manager to get some answers Jan. 4.

"Basically, I called and asked if I was on his list," she said.

After hearing she was being laid off, Heaslet said she was filled with shock and confusion.

"I couldn't believe it," she said. "No one else knows my office job, and it's going to take three to four part-time people to replace me."

Heaslet said she was unsure of what she would do and where she would find future employment.

"Twenty-six years and what do I have to show for it?" she said. "That's been our daily life. I took a lot of pride in it."

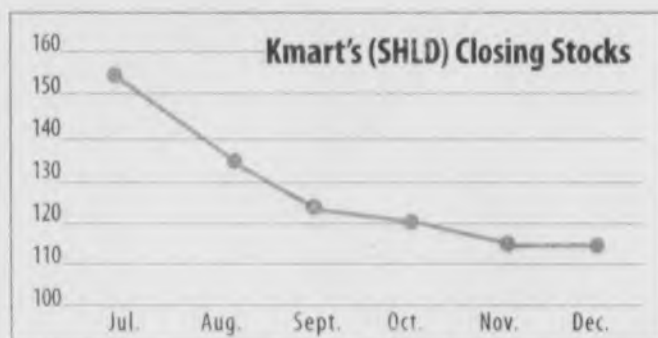

John Hill, a Kmart employee of 32 years, worked as the electronics manager at the Manhattan store.

Hill said he walked into the store in the morning to get ready for his shift Jan. 4 when his manager called him back to the office to tell him he was being fired.

"I walked in at 9 a.m. and was escorted out at 9:15," he said. "Let me tell you, it was a shocker beyond belief."

Hill said he was full of shock and anger about the situation when he walked out of the store.

"It's like a bad dream, and when "I think it was a combination of age, the amount of money I was making and benefits," he said. "They replaced us with younger, part-time people."

Hill was told he could reapply for a part-time position one week after he was fired but without the guarantee of being rehired.

Donna Thompson, a Kmart employee for more than eight years, said she read information on a Kmart employee Web site that changes were coming.

Thompson, who also was laid off, said her biggest concern now is finding new employment.

"I have to. I have to work," she said. "I have bills to pay."

Pam Young arrived to work at 5 a.m. Jan. 4 to help unload a truck with her coworkers. After finishing the job, Young was called into her manager's office to receive the bad news.

After working for the company for 13 years, Young was allowed to clean out her locker and was escorted to the door by her manager.

"It was so degrading and humiliating," she said. "It was such a part of my life, and they gave us absolutely nothing."

Young said she does have a job interview with Waters True Value Hardware, and she is willing to see what the business can offer her.

"At 59, I'm sorry, but there are not many opportunities for people my age," she said.

Civil rights leader addresses social injustice

By Jonas Hogg
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Riley's Conference Center at Fort Riley, Kan. was an emotional place Wednesday.

Martin Luther King III spoke at Fort Riley during an early ceremony commemorating Martin Luther King Jr. day, which will be officially observed Monday.

"The man we're going to be talking about today is the first person to ever sit down and tell me about the Lord, ever," Chaplain Daniel McClure said before he began the benediction. "So I have a slightly different memory of Dr. King."

In honor of Martin Luther King Jr. day and to greet King III, the Fort Riley elementary schools had a poster contest, and the entries proudly displayed around the conference center.

One poster depicted a stick figure drawing of the elder King, along with an inscription in first-grade penmanship that read, "I like him vaere moch."

Maj. Gen. Dennis Hardy, at times emotional, spoke of the importance of the works of the elder King, as well as King III.

"We think of Dr. Martin Luther King having changed the path that our nation was on," Hardy said.

King's speech focused largely on social injustice and inequality in American society, issues that echo the causes his father championed.

Hobnob's replaces Cox Bros.

By Logan C. Adams
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

A new restaurant is expected to open today in the building that used to house Cox Bros. BBQ.

Hobnob's, 600 S. Fourth St., will feature classic American breakfast items and full service, owner Craig Smith said. Smith said he planned for his restaurant to be open for lunch and dinner starting today, and to start serving breakfast next week.

Smith said he has been remodeling the building, including the relocation of the smoker to outside the kitchen.

Smith said he will keep the barbecue portion of the menu but will be making several additions.

Cox Bros. BBQ closed its doors earlier this month because owners Bud and Bob Cox are exploring other markets, business partner Peter Doucette said.

The Cox brothers also own CoCo Bolos in Aggieville, which will stay open.

Doucette said the brothers are working on opening a new Cox Bros. BBQ in Lake Shawnee, near Topeka, and another CoCo Bolos in Kansas City, Kan. "A good opportunity came by for us," Doucette said. "We figured having four restaurants was not feasible for us."

The Cox brothers could not be reached for comment.

Alito diffuses criticism, abortion questions

By David Epso
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON, D.C. — Supreme Court nominee Samuel Alito calmly turned aside Democratic attacks on his judicial record at confirmation hearings Wednesday, declaring his impartiality and saying, "If I'm confirmed I'll be myself."

He joined Senate Democrats in denouncing the positions of a controversial Princeton alumni group he once highlighted.

"I am who I am and I am my own person," said the 55-year-old appeals court judge, who would replace Justice Sandra Day O'Connor in what has been a swing seat on the Supreme Court.

Under persistent questioning, Alito declined for a second straight day to say whether he believes, as he did in 1985, that the Constitution contains no right to an abortion.

"I don't think it's appropriate for me to speak about issues that could realistically come up" before the courts, he said.

Alito commands the support of all 10 Republicans on the Senate Judiciary Committee, and while Democrats can delay his approval by the panel, they cannot block it.

His prospects for confirmation by the full Senate also are strong, although Democrats have not ruled out the possibility of a filibuster that could require supporters to post 60 votes.

Still, unlike Chief Justice John Roberts last fall, Alito might draw the opposition of all eight Democrats on the panel, and partisan maneuvering was evident Wednesday.

Abortion triggered one incident. Sen. Richard Durbin, D-Ill., who supports abortion rights, told Alito that his 1985 written view on abortion "does not evidence an open mind. It evidences a mind that sadly is closed in some areas."

Sen. Tom Coburn R-Okla., saying he wanted to "razz" Durbin, soon noted that Durbin had himself changed his mind on abortion.

"For 45 years, Sen. Durbin was adamantly pro-life, and he wrote multiple, multiple letters expressing that up until 1989," Coburn said.

Later, Sen. Edward M. Kennedy, D-Mass., pressed the committee's chairman, Sen. Arlen Specter, R-Pa., to subpoena records at the Library of Congress that might shed light on Alito's membership in Concerned Alumni of Princeton.

"If I'm going to be denied that, I'd want to give notice to the chair that you're going to hear it again and again and again and we're going to have votes of this committee again and again and again until we have a resolution," Kennedy said.

Specter, bristling, said, "I'm not concerned about your threats to have votes again, again and again. And I'm the chairman of this committee. ... And I'm not going to have you run this committee."

The tempest proved short-lived. Specter later announced the committee would have access to the records.

Earlier, Kennedy questioned Alito sharply about the organization, which drew notice for opposing admission practices that resulted in rising numbers of women and minority students at the Ivy League school.

"If I had received any information at any point regarding any of the matters you referred to ... I would never have had anything to do with it," said Alito, who listed his membership in the group on a 1985 job application for the Reagan administration but now says he does not recall anything about it.

Outside the committee room, Kennedy was scathing.

"He can remember all 67 dissents ... in great details," he said of Alito and his judicial record. "But he can't remember anything about this organization."

Those judicial dissents drew the attention of several Democrats, as did other rulings over the course of Alito's 15-year tenure on the appeals court.

Durbin cited rulings in cases involving a black man accused of murder, a retarded man who had been sexually molested and an injury at a coal worksite.

He said that in each case, Alito had made rulings that favored the powerful at the expense of the powerless.

"I find this as a recurring pattern, and it raises the question in my mind whether the average person, the dispossessed person, the poor person who finally has their day in court ... are going to be subject to the crushing hand of fate when it comes to your decisions."

Alito defended his rulings one by one and then was offered a chance for a general reply.

He cited a case in which a "high school student had been bullied unmercifully by other students in his school because of their perception of his sexual orientation, been bullied to the point of attempting to commit suicide."

The school board refused a request from the parents to move their child to a different school, but Alito said, "I wrote an opinion upholding their right to have him placed in a safe school in an adjacent municipality."

TO THE POINT Laid-off Kmart employees need compensation

More than five full-time employees with more than a century of combined service were fired from Manhattan's Kmart on Jan. 4.

While the local manager cannot comment on the situation, employees have speculated that the layoffs were due to corporate downsizing.

Several employees also have said they were not offered severance packages from the corporation.

The employees were told they could reapply for part-time employment, but no guarantees could be made of being rehired.

Long-time workers deserve a chance to find another job before being fired. These workers have counted on a steady and reliable income to support themselves and have shown dedication to their jobs and should be allowed that opportunity.

With 20 and even 30 years of service at Kmart, the terminated employees should have been offered severance packages with insurance, unemployment plans or stock options.

Another option for Manhattan's Kmart could have been to lay off newer employees with shorter employment or those working part-time.

This could have at least increased the chance of keeping employed those who depend on the job.

Offering part-time work to those with standing tenure at the corporation was an insult.

Kmart should have offered more reasonable options to those fired.

Executive abuse Bush administration threatens citizens' rights

So far in America's history, the impeachment process has worked relatively well.

It was a big enough threat to force Nixon's resignation and failed to remove Clinton and Johnson for unjust reasons. It is now time for it to prove it's still a big enough threat to remove a president.

Sure, this has been something I have wanted for a long time now. I mean, seriously, President George W. Bush has war crimes going against him. But no matter the crimes he has committed against other countries, it finally has reached the point where President Bush has turned on Americans.

We are slowly having our freedoms ripped out of our arms one by one.

It terrifies me to think I now live in a country that might monitor my phone calls in case I'm linked to terrorism. Or one that looks up what I've been browsing online for the same reasons.

I'm sure many of you, at one time or another, have searched to see if there were evil Web sites on the Internet that are rumored to be. Or even in doing a school report on Nazi Germany, wound up on some idiot's Hitler fan site.

What really makes our situation worse is that Bush has not given up on torture yet. In order to regain the support of a public who occasionally forgets to pay attention, President Bush signed the torture ban while also adding a signing statement, according to a Jan. 3 article on CNN.com. By doing this, he was able to include his own interpretation of the bill to be used by the courts when applying it. Citing a terrorist with a ticking bomb scenario, Bush stated the executive branch has the authority to ignore the bill.

Sure, his statement said that it was for "protecting the American people from further terrorist attacks." But if he's willing to kill 30,000 civilians for the same reason in Iraq, letting torture remain in his arsenal is something we need to object to.

With such a broad term as terrorism, Bush could find a way to attach it to anyone who has committed a crime in his life. Even if you have never crossed the line of the law before, I can't imagine this not scaring the bejesus out of you.

With this left intact, and just one corrupt president, you could end up having your child arrested and tortured for making a wrong click on the keyboard or joking around on the phone.

Bush might not be the man abusing us when these horrific events occur, but he is the man who took away our rights, the very rights that we need to protect us from such events.

By spying on us he has committed an atrocious crime. By keeping the door to torture open he has threatened our future generations.

We can only hope that Congress can stand up to this man and get rid of him and his whole administration.

Embrace Christmas spirit all year

What I saw over break proves that we are all in need of a hand.

I was returning from Beam's Music Store in Ephrata, Penn., driving along a little highway at about three in the afternoon.

I approached an intersection and saw yet another indistinct group of Amish children making their way home from school. I slowed, noticing that the smallest of the group, no more than five years old, waited on the other side of the road. Stopping in the middle of the intersection, I waved the little boy across the road. He turned and began walking the other direction through a field of corn stalks, so I moved on.

In passing, I was horrified to see his face writhed into a painful contortion yielding torrents of tears. I went on until I found a place I could turn around and hustled back.

LUCAS MADDY

My heart raced at the anxiety of the little boy's tears.

Coming back, I rolled down the passenger window and gave a shout to the little boy, trudging through the muddy field in his plain overcoat and quaint straw hat.

"Hey buddy," I yelled, making sure he saw my smile before I continued, "Are you all right?"

His automatic reaction, of course, to a stranger, was to turn and nod his head, continuing on. But then he stood for a second and glanced back, seemingly pleased and likely thinking, "That guy is looking out for me!"

Moving past the original group, one of the older boys had made his way back across the road to follow the little one, his visage that of a sibling's concern. Maybe he had been going to play with the big group, and the little one was made unwelcome. I'll never know.

At any rate, he adopted a fatherly look and shook his head, sending me the signal that the little one would be taken care of now. As he could be no older than 12, I still felt I could impart a bit of shame on him. "You take care of him now," said I, speaking "Stern Grandpa." He nodded.

I turned again and made my way back in the original direction. By now, three girls had made their way back across the road, following the older boy, who trailed my young friend. I rolled down my window and waved to them all with a disarming smile. As I got to the little one, tears drying, I felt his gaze turn and land on me, with an expectant look. I said the only thing I could.

"Hey buddy! Merry Christmas!"

He looked at me and smiled.

Christmas break holds the promise of fulfilling the unfulfilled. Charging the batteries with enough family and love to get on through into summer, we reflect on the rapid passing of time. Catch a high school basketball game, and the reality of age looks harshly upon us through the narrowed eyes of adolescence. At home, church, in the community, the world revolves around them.

Why? The "F" word — future. They are the future — what hopefully will become a better "us."

The time is, always has been, and always will be, now. We lost "Christmas Break" and replaced it with "The Holidays," soon to be unseated by "Winter Break," but the spirit, burning bright through the shortest, darkest time of year, is ours to keep. It'll stretch to spring break at least. Wildcats, welcome back.

FROM THE EDITOR

New editor in chief hopes to give readers what they want

I'm a strong believer that to get respect you have to first give respect.

That's why my priority this semester is respecting you, the readers.

Giving respect isn't difficult. A lot of times respecting someone just means listening to what that person has to say.

I can't begin to count how many times I have heard complaints about the Collegian from friends, classmates and even professors. But instead of getting mad every time someone blurts out "The Collegian sucks," I just ask them what they think could be improved.

Reader opinions are important to me. Without them, how would we judge what content to publish every day?

Although I can promise an open mind and a sympathetic ear, I can't possibly make every change asked of me.

LEANN
SULZEN

Every group wants its events covered and its story on the front page. With such limited space, there is no way we can please everyone.

That is why I try to talk to as many people as possible about the Collegian and its content so I can get a better feel of what readers really want.

It's not too difficult to get in touch with me. Call the Collegian newsroom at (785) 532-6556, e-mail me at collegian@pub.ksu.edu or come by my office in Kedzie 116.

Another way readers can express how they feel about the Collegian is through our reader surveys that will be published on page two and on our Web site, www.kstatecollegian.com, throughout the semester beginning next week.

The reader survey will be a way for the Collegian to keep in touch with what readers are thinking – what they would like to have covered more, and what they would like to have covered less.

Readers will be able to send their responses to an e-mail address that will be published with the survey.

The Collegian will not respond directly to e-mails received involving survey results; however, comments and concerns will be evaluated and discussed by editors.

If you would like a more direct response, don't forget to use our e-mail address, call or stop by the newsroom. As always, letters to the editor are always appreciated. These can be brought into Kedzie 116 or e-mailed to letters@pub.ksu.edu.

I hope that in my endeavors to respect you by being open to comments and criticism, that I will in turn receive respect from you.

After all, it is our duty at the Collegian to serve the readers.

Volunteering key to holiday

Dear K-State faculty, staff and students:

As you know, the University is closed Monday, Jan. 16, in recognition of Martin Luther King, Jr. Day. People around the country are continuing a tradition of making this holiday "a day ON, not a day OFF" through volunteer work in their communities. Manhattan will join them.

The life of Dr. King is a prime and extraordinary example of the power of service, and there is no better way to honor his legacy than by participating in Monday's MLK Day of Service. I encourage everyone to take the time given for observance and use it to serve the community that gives so much support to K-State throughout the year.

To sign up to participate or for more information contact the K-State Community Service Program at (785) 532-5701 or ksuserve@ksu.edu. All volunteers will meet at the Center Court of Manhattan Town Center before going to one of 10 project sites to serve. The opportunity is open to everyone in the community, so you may bring family members and friends, as well.

I am proud of the K-State family's commitment to diversity, equality and service, and I thank you in advance for sharing your talents and time to strengthen this great community of Manhattan.

Kansas' direct connection to FBI Fingerprint File gives police better access to criminal records

ASSOCIATED PRESS

LAWRENCE — Kansas has become the eighth state to connect to the FBI's National Fingerprint File, which Kansas Bureau of Investigation officials say will give police in other states easier and more detailed access to criminal history records from Kansas.

The KBI processes more than 130,000 criminal fingerprint records every year. The prints, collected when people are booked into jail, are linked to their criminal history information.

The practice has been for the KBI to send duplicate fingerprint and arrest records to the FBI on arrests for serious felonies and misdemeanors. If another state sought information, it would come directly from the FBI file.

However, that information isn't as detailed as the state's file, which includes the disposition of the arrest and where the person lives and works.

"In most states, the state's central repository has a better version of the record than that provided to the FBI and what the FBI maintains," said Dave Sim, who is in charge of the KBI's information services division.

Now only a suspect's first set of fingerprints will be sent to the FBI, and the state will notify the FBI electronically every time a criminal is processed for a new arrest. When another agency seeks information about a criminal the KBI can release it over a secure computer network.

"We take responsibility and a much greater role to release the records that originate in Kansas, so in most instances the agency that's looking at a record is going to get a much better record now when Kansas responds," Sim said.

Other states participating so far are Florida, North Carolina, New Jersey, Oregon, Montana, Oklahoma and Colorado.

Young's game history worthy

The 2005 USC Trojans could defeat any team in the history of college football, if they were to play a game right now.

This was the message ESPN was giving the country a few weeks before this year's National Championship game when it began a series in which analysts Chris Fowler, Kirk Herbstreit and Mark May debated nightly on SportsCenter about whether the Trojans of today could defeat the best teams of the past.

The teams they chose to debate were decided by fan voting.

Some of the teams chosen to go against the Trojans were the '55 Oklahoma team, the '95 Nebraska team and the '00 Miami team, all national champions.

Every night the analysts put another all-time great team against the Trojans, and every night the "other" team was belittled by the analysts, who said repeatedly how the '05 Trojans had too much offensive power with the two Heisman trophy winners, quarterback Matt Leinart and running back/return man/all-world player Reggie Bush, in the backfield.

I am not going to lie — the majority of these teams would probably not stand a chance against the Trojans.

However, they can analyze all they want about past teams. We actually got the pleasure of watching the Trojans go against another great team that everybody seemed to forget.

There was one team, one game standing between the Trojans and history as they vied for a third-straight national title.

Enter the No. 1 team in the country, ladies and gentleman. I give you the Vince Youngs, excuse me, the 2005 Texas Longhorns.

The Longhorns did the impossible and showed the world they were the better team after defeating the Trojans 41-38 in the Rose Bowl on Jan. 4 to win the national championship.

This game was won by Longhorn quarterback Young. I wrote in an earlier column that Young would not win the Heisman, but he was the most dominant player on the most dominant team.

He also has one thing over Leinart — his ability to scramble.

Not only did Young prove me right, but he did so in stunning fashion.

Young threw for 267 yards on 30 of 40 passing.

That's a good day for any quarterback, but what Young did with his legs was almost unreal.

Anytime he felt pressure he was able to find a crease in the defense and scramble for a first down. He rushed for 200 yards on just 19 carries — the most by a quarterback in the national championship game — and scored three times on the ground.

His most impressive score came with less than a minute to play with his team down by five. On fourth and 5, he again found a hole in the defense and was able to scamper eight yards for the go-ahead touchdown to seal the victory for the Longhorns.

This was the Vince Young show, and he rose to the occasion.

He is the sole reason why the crystal football is coming back to the Big 12 Conference.

This game should teach analysts to wait until after games are played to give titles such as "Greatest Team Ever" to certain teams because on Jan. 4, Young and his Longhorns were that team.

Wildcats fall to Nebraska, 57-42

By Nick Dunn
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Poor shooting from the field, a lack of offensive production and an abundance of fouls all piled up on the K-State men's basketball team to produce an "embarrassing" 57-42 defeat to the Nebraska Cornhuskers Wednesday night at Bramlage Coliseum.

The Wildcats, now 9-4 overall and 0-2 in the Big 12 Conference, were unable to get in any sort of rhythm on either end of the court against the Huskers (12-3, 2-0).

Coach Jim Wooldridge said he was disappointed with his team's effort. Players were unavailable for comment after the game. He said it was his team's lack of competitiveness that upset him the most.

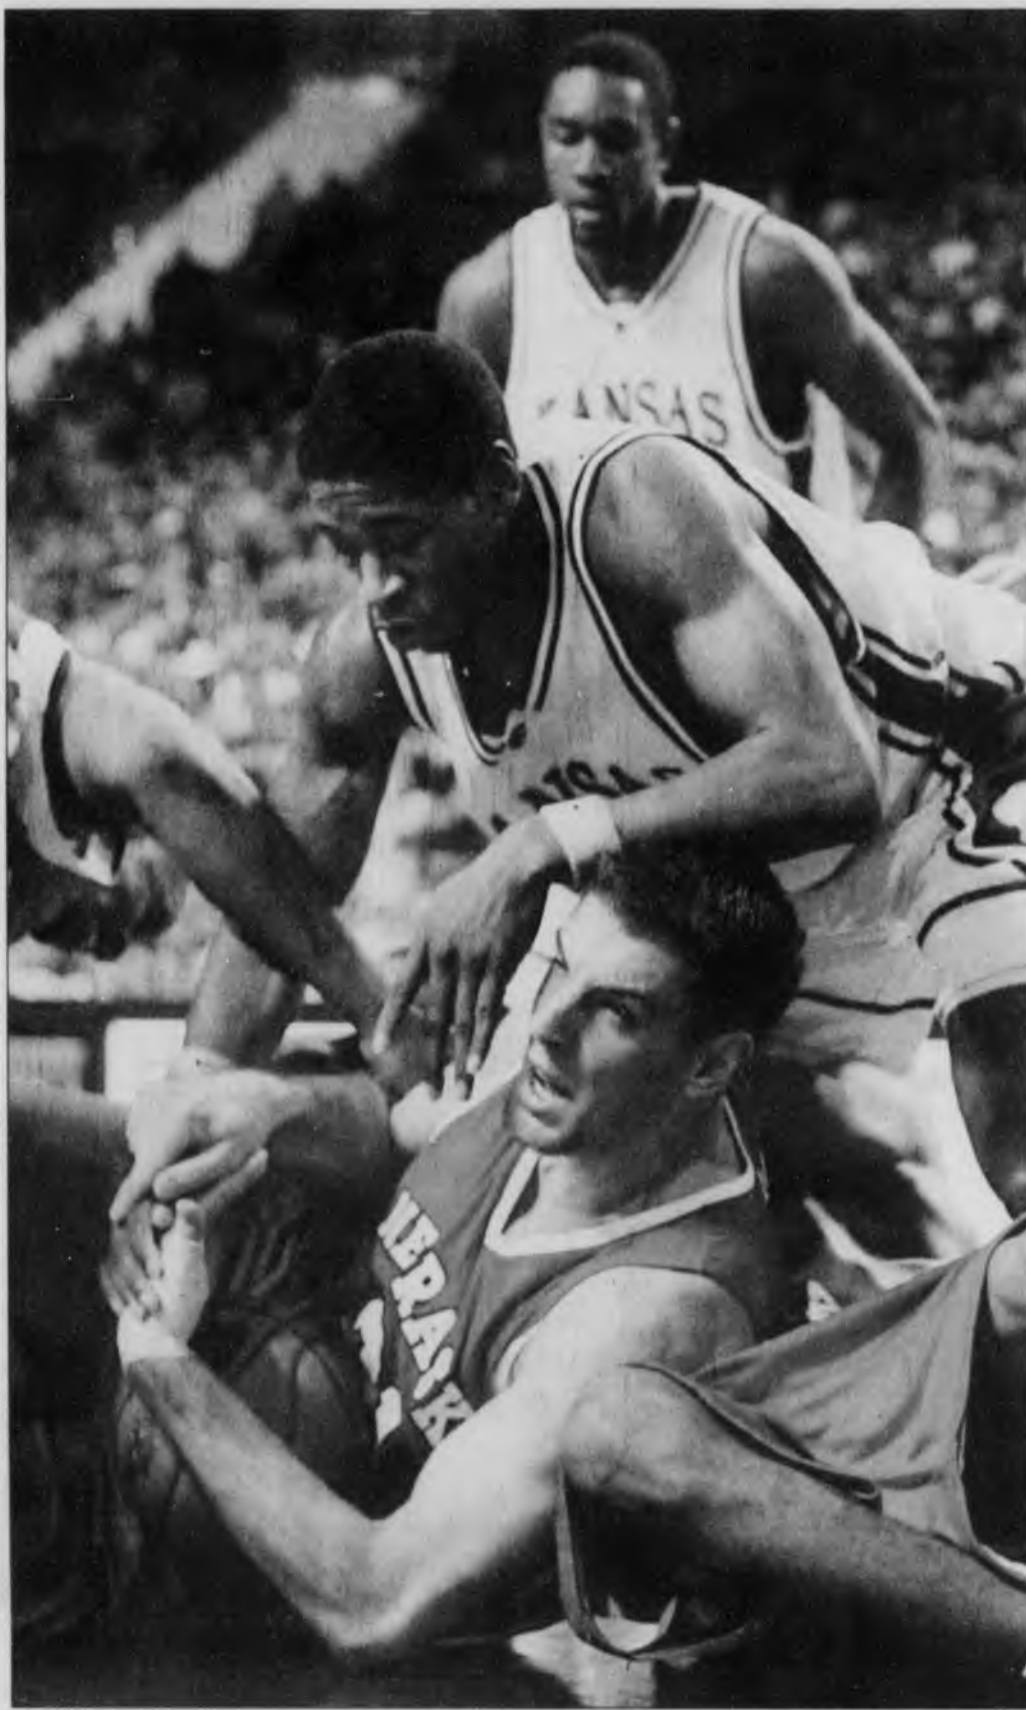

"That's the most embarrassing effort I've ever been associated with as a college basketball player or as a college basketball coach," Wooldridge said. "There's no way to sugarcoat it. There's no way to bring any positive out of it."

Only one word could accurately describe the quality of play between the two teams in the first half — sloppy. Nebraska opened the game with a 13-2 run after K-State missed 11 of its first 12 shots, but then cooled off considerably for the rest of the half.

The two teams combined to shoot 15-of-61 (24.6 percent) from the field, and Nebraska held a slim 24-20 advantage at the break. Husker center Aleks Maric was the only player who performed particularly well, scoring 11 points and grabbing 13 rebounds before the half.

Wooldridge takes blame for poor play

By Angie Hanson
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

It's a word not often associated with basketball games, but one of the only words Coach Jim Wooldridge could use to describe Wednesday night's 57-42 loss to Nebraska was disturbing.

"You can write all kinds of scenarios, but the bottom line that goes to the absolute heart of it is, we didn't act like competitors, as coaches or players, and that is disturbing," Wooldridge said. "That is very, very disturbing."

Although Wooldridge made it clear his players had the most embarrassing performance he had ever witnessed in his coaching tenure, he largely assumed responsibility for the loss.

"It triggers a lot of different emotions after watching that, seeing how we behaved," he said. "I talk so much and so long about the tradition here and all the great people who've supported the program. I believe in a sense of pride in the program, and that's just so disturbing to me that I've coached a team that acts this way."

"I haven't done a very good job of making our team more competitive, obviously."

It was hard to pinpoint exactly what was the most troublesome aspect of K-State's defeat. There were many to choose from.

It could have been the Cats' 11 field goals on the night, which was the lowest output from a team during Wooldridge's coaching stint. Maybe it was the fact that K-State shot 23 percent (11-of-47) against the Huskers, which also is the worst shooting effort Wooldridge has coached.

Perhaps it was K-State's 42 total points and only seven assists on the game — both season lows for the Cats.

"It's really hard to take anything positive out of it," Wooldridge said.

The team that earlier in the season received votes in the ESPN/

Turnovers, fouls plague Cats in 66-39 loss to Texas A&M

By Matt Gorney
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

A combination of turnovers and fouls doomed the Wildcats as they fell to Texas A&M 66-39 Wednesday night at Reed Arena in College Station, Texas.

K-State (11-4, 1-2 Big 12) had 27 turnovers that resulted in 32 points for the Aggies (13-3, 2-1).

"I thought the name of the game tonight was turnovers," Coach Deb Patterson said. "You can't go on the road and throw the ball away like we did tonight."

Fouls also posed a problem for K-State, recording eight in the first half and another 11 in the second half. Both freshman JoAnn Hamlin and sophomore Kimberly Dietz ended the game with four fouls, while junior Twiggy McIntyre had three.

Texas A&M totaled eight fouls per half and shot 67 percent from the free-throw line, scoring 12 points.

The Wildcats were able to offset their turnover and foul troubles with 53.3 percent shooting in the first half. However, coming out of halftime, K-State was held to 29.2 percent shooting, making only seven of 24 shots.

"They played terrific defense, all 40 minutes of it, and we'll keep working on getting better," Patterson said. "I don't think you see that kind of pressure and quickness a whole lot. I think this defensive basketball team is really tough."

Hamlin led K-State in scoring, knocking in two free throws and four of five from the field for 10 points, the only Wildcat to score in double digits.

Other leading scorers for the Wildcats were Dietz and freshman Marlies Gipson, who both had nine points.

With 4:45 remaining in the first half, K-State took their first and only lead of the game, 21-20, on a 3-pointer from Dietz.

After that, the Aggies went on a 3:46, 11-0 run to end the half at 31-21. Eleven Aggies scored in the game with sophomore Morenike Atunrase adding 17 points to lead her squad.

"That 3:46, I thought we got careless with the ball, careless with our possessions," Patterson said. "We had a couple of turnovers during that stretch, just made those mistakes that can turn it on you so quick and I thought that deflated our basketball team."

In the second half, K-State only managed to score 18 points, while the Aggies added another 35 points the

FBC | USC running back declares for NFL draft

Southern California is losing its Thunder. It might be losing its Lightning, as well.

Running back LenDale White declared for the NFL draft Wednesday. White, a 6-foot-2, 235-pound junior, could be the third major offensive weapon to leave USC for the NFL this year, following the departure of quarterback Matt Leinart. Heisman Trophy winner Reggie Bush is set to announce whether he'll go pro or stay with the Trojans today.

Aikman quarterbacked Dallas to three Super Bowl titles between the 1992 to 1995 seasons. White, who died Dec. 26, 2004, was one of the NFL's dominant defensive linemen through the 1980s and '90s.

Bulgaria's Sesil Karatantcheva, a quarterfinalist at last year's French Open, was banned for two years for doping.

Karatantcheva tested positive after the French Open quarterfinal, which she lost to Russia's Elena Likhovtseva on May 31. She also failed an out-of-competition test July 5 in Tokyo. Both tests were treated as a first offense by an ITF tribunal that met Dec. 14-15 in London.

Karatantcheva, who beat Venus Williams in the third round at the French, is ranked 41st on the WTA Tour.

"Munich"

Movie review by Brendan Praeger

"Munich" overcomes an awkwardly executed ending to provide enough excitement and tension to place it among the best films of 2005.

Steven Spielberg's politically-charged thriller tells the story of Israel's bid for justice following the murder of 11 Israeli athletes during the 1972 Olympic games. Avner (Eric Bana) leads a team of five assassins in an attempt to locate and execute those responsible for the attack.

Authentic news footage aids the re-enactment of the murders in Munich. This creates a sense of realism and immediacy, even though the audience already knows the tragic outcome. Spielberg shows most of the terrorist attacks at the beginning of the film, although frequent flashbacks revive Avner's thirst for vengeance during moments of moral crisis.

Munich achieves a high level of excitement, and the action is far from mindless. Every bullet has a purpose, and every kill has consequences.

The characters face not only the moral question of whether an "eye for an eye" approach to justice is acceptable, they also have to assess the aftermath of each successful assassination. The victories provide little satisfaction when a new terrorist emerges to replace a fallen predecessor. Their paranoia grows as each killing triggers new terrorist attacks and compromises their safety and sanity.

"Munich" slows at the end, but never becomes boring or repetitive. Its main misstep comes during a sex scene near the conclusion that is spliced with the deaths of the Israeli athletes. It's awkwardly executed, and feels out of place with the quality direction of the rest of the film.

While "Munich" is by no means Spielberg's best film (the man did make "Gremlins"), it stands as a captivating thriller, and leaves a lasting impression you'd be hard-pressed to find in any other film from 2005.

"The Family Stone"

Movie review by Lauren Roher

The "Family Stone" is a solid movie that loses its pace because there is simply too much going on.

Imagine "Meet The Parents" with not three but five siblings plus their spouses. There are some big names that will get you to the movie such as Diane Keaton, Luke Wilson, Rachel McAdams and Sarah Jessica Parker, to name a few. But there comes a point in the film where you begin to question whether you are seeing a comedy or a drama.

The title refers to the Stones, who are having their Christmas gathering at their family home. Their son Everett (Dermot Mulrony) is bringing his new girlfriend Meredith (Parker) and hopes the weekend will be perfect so he can propose to her.

However, the other family members appear to be doing everything they can to embarrass Meredith, especially daughter Amy (McAdams). This is the part of the film when I thought it was going to be a "Meet The Parents" type comedy.

Meredith eventually can't take it anymore and calls her sister Julie (Claire Danes) to join her. When Julie finally arrives, there are sparks between her and Everett that come from out of nowhere and really make no sense. Meanwhile, Meredith finds herself strangely drawn to Everett's brother Ben, (Wilson) another romantic connection that makes no sense, but we go along with because Wilson's character is so lovably deranged.

In the film's most surprising turn, a huge secret about the mother (Keaton) is revealed.

The film ping-pongs between crazy comedy and heavy drama and is so heavy on plot that the characters lose their luster. Still, "The Family Stone" does have a terrific cast. McAdams adds a solid performance to what has been an incredible start for her young career. Wilson also steals a few scenes and gets the film's biggest laughs as the stoned black sheep of the family.

"Hostel"

Movie review by Loni Woolery

"Hostel" is a mediocre film disguised with a Quentin Tarantino label. The newest in a string of recent horror films, "Hostel" is directed by Eli Roth and coexecutive-produced by Tarantino.

A good horror movie should have an solid plot followed up by believable acting.

For the most part, Jay Hernandez (Friday Night Lights, Crazy/Beautiful) offers a respectable performance, especially when he is faced with his own worst fears.

Hostel shows the story of three twenty-something friends who go backpacking across Europe post college graduation. In their quest for ultimate satisfaction — hot girls, uninhibited sexual encounters and marijuana — they come across a local who knows the location of the perfect party spot.

Once their every desire has been fulfilled in this promiscuous Slovakian hostel, the real horror begins. People are picked off left and right, leaving the audience wondering if evil really will prevail this time.

No longer is just the fear of death being used in horror films, but lately the fear of torture is being seen more and more. Besides a few twists and unexpected turns, the plot seemed thin and lacked any real reasoning behind it. Don't get me wrong, I am huge horror film fan and having been waiting for a film to restore my faith.

However, "Hostel" didn't fulfill my hopes.

It was like eating a Lean Cuisine dinner and expecting to be full afterward. There was enough gore, guts and corpses lying about to make the movie mildly entertaining, but it is certainly not worth paying $7.50 to watch.

Lohan denies Vanity Fair bulimia story

NEW YORK — Actress Lindsay Lohan has denied telling Vanity Fair that she suffered from bulimia, Teen People magazine said Wednesday, but Vanity Fair said Lohan's comments are all on tape.

In a Vanity Fair cover story last week the star of Herbie: Fully Loaded said she had suffered from eating disorders and admitted dabbling in drugs. She said she was on the brink of physical and emotional collapse.

"I was making myself sick. I was sick and I had people sit me down and say, 'You're going to die if you don't take care of yourself,'" Lohan, 19, told Vanity Fair.

But Teen People's online edition on Wednesday said Lohan denied the claims made in the article. "The words that I gave to the writer for Vanity Fair were misused and mis-constructed, and I'm appalled with the way it was done," Teen People quoted Lohan as saying in an e-mail dated January 9.

Vanity Fair defended its reporter and the story by saying: "Evgenia Peretz is one of our most reliable reporters. Every word Lindsay Lohan told her is on tape. Vanity Fair stands by the story."

Britney Spears tops worst-dressed list

Spears has been a favorite on Blackwell's list for the past five years. He described her Tuesday as going from "princess of pop to the ultimate fashion flop."

Sex remains a great way to lose holiday weight

Ask the 5th year

MATT
Class of 2006

I've gained a few pounds over the winter break. Any tips on losing this unwanted weight?

I'm sure we are all suffering from a little weight gain because of all of the Christmas dinners and leftovers.

I have a few vices, and one thing that I cannot say no to is a home-baked, chocolate-chip cookie. My dad must have baked more than a hundred while I was home, and darn it, I couldn't control myself.

The usual ways to lose weight are diet and exercise. My uncontrollable desire for cookies prevents me from dieting. What about exercise? I already run every day, and my weight isn't going down. Personally, I blame my metabolism. I'm sure that many readers have the same problem. Now, I'm not going to start running twice a day. I am at a pass then, right?

I have found a solution. Have more sex. Sex is a great workout and is definitely more enticing than running around City Park or going to the Rec.

So, you've got those few extra pounds ... they don't call them love handles for nothing.

When I was home, my parents still treated me like I was in high school with a curfew and everything. What can I do?

Convincing our parents that we are now adults and can take care of ourselves can be challenging. I have two separate strategies, and they involve appealing to the parent of the opposite sex.

For the girls out there, your dad just wants to protect his precious daughter.

The next time you go home, wear a shirt that says "Daddy's Little Princess." This shows him you are and will always be his daughter.

He just doesn't want to lose you. Sit him down and explain that you've already survived a semester away from home. He can afford to loosen the restrictions when you are home.

For the guys out there, all you have to do is buy your mom a shirt that says "K-State Mom." There is no better way to tell her that "Hey, I'm in college now. I can take care of myself."

At the same time, you've given her something in which she can take pride. Every time she wears it she will be reminded that her little son has grown up.

Hopefully, this will help alleviate having to call your mom every day to only once a week.

U.S., South Korean beef ban talks begin

By Jonas Hogg
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Kansas beef farmers might get something to smile about soon, although cattle might not be too happy.

The United States has entered into negotiations with South Korea in hopes of eventually lifting South Korea's ban on imports of American beef.

According to the U.S. Meat Export Federation, South Korea imported 246,958 tons of U.S. beef at a value of $815.8 million in 2003.

The United States provided 68 percent of South Korea's imported beef, and Korean domestic beef prices remain 3.5 times higher than imported beef.

For Kansans that translated to $18,962,215, which made South Korea Kansas' fourth-largest export market 2003, said Lisa Taylor, public information officer for the Kansas Department of Agriculture.

The South Korea ban came after the U.S. discovery of bovine spongiform encephalopathy (BSE), commonly known as mad cow disease, which is believed to cause the human degenerative brain disorder Creutzfeldt-Jakob.

Japan, which enacted a similar ban, already has agreed to reopen its market to U.S. imports.

Beef exported to Japan must meet the guidelines of the Beef Export Verification Program run by the United States Dairy Association, and beef suppliers must comply with the Quality System Assessment program.

The associations Web site lists six suppliers in Kansas in compliance with the program.

Matt Teagarden, director of Industry Relations for the Kansas Livestock Association, said it is unclear whether Korean exports, if approved, will use the programs already established for Japanese exports.

Teagarden said while many of the association's members are anticipating the opportunities presented by South Korea, the reopening of the market will not significantly affect Kansas farmers.

"Total exports accounted for only about 10 percent of our annual production prior to 2003," he said.

Teagarden said the greatest opportunity South Korea offers is a market that buys cuts of meat American consumers usually shun, such as tongue and rib meat.

"It's still important to the overall beef industry because of the added dollars coming into the beef market," he said.

Sean Fox, interim head of K-State's Department of Agriculture, said he agrees the local effects will not be critical.

Fox said an increase in demand would positively affect prices locally, but that it would not be immediately noticeable.

On the national level, Fox said cessation of the beef trade with Canada has been more damaging than South Korean or Japanese bans.

"What has hurt us is the lack of imports from Canada, which has resulted in some plant closures in the north U.S.," he said.

Although the potential effects of reopening trade with South Korea might not be immediately felt, Teagarden said he thinks the resumption of trade would be a positive move.

"Our members clearly see that there is a lot of opportunity," he said.

Talat Rahman, distinguished professor of physics, writes an equation on the chalkboard. Rahman's work with "walking molecule" was named as one of the top 25 physics stories of 2005.

Professor's work among '05 top studies

By Megan Molitor
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Talat Rahman, distinguished professor of physics, recently added another honor to her list of academic accomplishments.

Rahman is a condensed matter theorist, which, according to a press release, means she investigates the physics of nano-materials, solid surfaces and interfaces. She recently had her "walking molecule" work named as one of the top 25 physics stories of 2005 by the American Institute of Physics.

Talat was in Pakistan to teach a course on electronic structure calculation, employing the same calculations used in her walking molecule research.

Rahman said she hopes to start a group there to do the same type of work and get new students to come to K-State.

While overseas, she also worked with the hurricane relief effort, which she said concerns her. But she said she is relieved to see so many foreigners helping.

Rahman, along with colleagues Ludwig Bartels, University of California; Sergey Stolbov, research assistant professor of physics at K-State; and professors Tony Heinz and Stephen O'Brien, Columbia University, were able to make a single molecule "walk."

Rahman said the molecule walks similar to a human, on two feet, with only one on the floor at a time. This is accomplished when one sulfur atom is in a "valley" and stable, and another is on a "hill" and unstable.

The unstable atom wishes to become stable, so it moves forward, therefore propelling the other atom forward as well.

However, a single molecule cannot walk on its own, Rahman said — it must be activated. This is accomplished by heat, or by prodding it with a scanning microscopic tip. The record for consecutive steps without faltering is 10,000.

This accomplishment can be put to great use, she said. It is part of a bigger picture, with the long-term goal being to understand what factors control dynamics of molecules and surfaces.

"We are trying to understand how atoms and molecules in nanostructured surfaces react to each other in certain environments," Rahman said. "If we know how to make it move in a certain direction, we can control the reaction."

Faisal Mehmood, graduate student in physics, said he is familiar with Rahman's work, as he has done research with her for the past five years.

"It was experimental, a theory, and it felt really good to learn of her accomplishment," Mehmood said. "It is a really exciting field."

Rahman has been funded by numerous sources during her tenure at K-State. Her walking molecule work was funded by a $1.5 million collaborative grant from the U.S.

Department of Energy. The grant was part of 11 groups funded in the United States as part of a program called "Catalysis Frontiers." Rahman's group was among them.

For her contributions to surface dynamics, Rahman has been invited to work at many research labs and has won many awards. According to a press release, her awards include the United Nations Development Program Fellowship award and Center for Nuclear Research Award-Italy Research Fellowship and Alexander von Humboldt Fellowship research prize.

She also is a Fellow of American Physical Society. Rahman has received the University Distinguished Graduate Faculty Member Award and was named a university distinguished professor. Many of her articles have been published in the Physical Review Letters.

She received her bachelor's degree in Pakistan and finished her doctorate at The University at Rochester.

Rahman discovered her accomplishment when she saw the announcement in the American Institute of Physics report.

2-cent postal rate increase goes into effect nationwide

By Abby Brownback
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Sarah Crawford, freshman in elementary education, tried to buy a 39-cent stamp from the United States Postal Service vending machines Wednesday in the K-State Student Union, but the machines were not stocked with the new stamps.

In the first postal rate increase since 2002, the price of mailing a first-class letter went up 2 cents to 39 cents Sunday.

Across-the-board hikes increased shipping costs by 5.4 percent, said Sam Gonzalez, manager of Post Office Operations in the Topeka area.

A 2003 federal mandate requires the USPS to put $3.1 billion in an escrow account by Oct. 1, Gonzalez said.

The U.S. Congress will determine later how the funds will be used.

Chuck Penning, Manhattan Post Office supervisor, said the rate increase was not made to compensate for rising USPS expenses.

Type	Was	Now
First-class letter (1 oz.)	37 cents	39 cents

Express Mail (5 lb.)	$13.65	$14.40
Certified mail	$2.30	$2.40
Money orders	90 cents	95 cents

Source: www.usps.com/ratecase

However, Lynette Mullinax, officer in charge of the Junction City Post Office, said the reasons behind the increase were twofold. It will put money in the escrow account and offset higher expenses.

"It helps us adjust to the fuel costs," she said.

New, non-denominated 39-cent stamps display the Statue of Liberty and the American flag. Two-cent stamps feature Navajo silver and turquoise jewelry.

Mullinax said the Junction City Post Office has sold out of its first shipment of 2-cent stamps. International rates, increased for the first time since 2001, went up 5.9 percent, Gonzalez said.

When adjusted for inflation, however, postage rates are the same as in 1971, when the USPS was created, Gonzalez said.

Both Penning and Mullinax said they do not anticipate a decrease in the amount of mail sent because of the rate hike, but Gonzalez said the amount of mail has decreased for other reasons.

"The use of Internet has affected our first-class letter mail," he said.

Katie Clark, freshman in elementary education, said she sends e-mails instead of letters through the USPS.

"It's a way to get around the stamps," she said.

K-State to offer classes at Fort Riley

By Hannah Crippen
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

K-State is offering four spring classes at the Main Post at Fort Riley, Kan.

Culture and Conflict, Violence Prevention and Intervention, Introduction to Women's Studies and Introduction to American Ethnic Studies can be taken for undergraduate credit on post at Fort Riley.

Culture and Conflict and Violence Prevention and Intervention also may be taken for graduate credit for the Conflict Resolution certificate.

Introduction to Women's Studies and Introduction to American Ethnic Studies are being offered through videoconferencing.

Melinda Sinn, public information coordinator of continuing education, said this means the classes are taught on campus and delivered through technology to the post.

TELENET 2 is a videoconferencing network K-State uses to connect to Fort Riley students.

Sue White, Kansas Regents

Network and TELENET 2 coordinator, said this technology allows classes to meet at the same time from different locations. It is a live connection by which students can see and hear what is happening in the other classroom, she said. The instructor would be in Dole Hall, she said.

Sinn said students should talk to their advisers to see if these courses meet their curriculum needs.

"If they don't have an adviser, they may speak with Ruth Stanley, a K-State representative on post, to see if the classes meet their academic needs," Sinn said.

The courses are open to all students. They can enroll online at www.dce.ksu.edu/courses.

The classes are offered in eight-week sessions. Session one starts in January and ends in March. Session two starts in March and ends in May. They will meet 5:30-8p.m. every Monday and Wednesday at the Main Post.

Class fees vary depending on the course, Sinn said.

4 professors receive research, teaching awards

By Kaley Lyon
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Four K-State faculty members, two from the College of Human Ecology and two from the College of Business Administration, are being recognized for outstanding research or teaching.

Melody LeHew and Deborah Meyer-Brosdahl, both associate professors of apparel and textiles, received the Barbara S. Stowe Endowed Faculty Development Fund Award for their efforts to improve sustainability within the fashion world.

LeHew
ASSOCIATE PROFESSOR OF APPAREL AND TEXTILES

"Basically ours was awarded for our research efforts. Our research focus is directed toward developing sustainable fashion," Meyer-Brosdahl said. "The fashion industry is really known for producing lots of fashion apparel, fashion related items, and most times people just get rid of it.

What we would like to do is make people aware that if they buy fashion products to do so in a responsible way — buy recyclable materials, anything that is less harmful to the environment than some of the manmade products out there."

The two professors will receive a combined stipend of about $1,500 which will help fund their attendance at the All Things Organic Conference, which will be held in affiliation with the International Conference on Organic Textiles. This conference will be May 6-9 in Chicago.

Meyer-Brosdahl
ASSOCIATE PROFESSOR OF APPAREL AND TEXTILES

LeHew and Meyer-Brosdahl have received about $200,000 in grants over the past few years, about $100,000 of which was awarded by the U.S. Department of Agriculture Challenge Grants program, for their research.

Richard McFarland, assistant professor of marketing, received the College of Business Administration Outstanding Research Award, which is distributed annually.

He was nominated for this award by colleagues and was presented with it during the Dec. 10 commencement exercises.

"I know that I had good research, but it's a big honor because your colleagues are basically saying that in the past year you've had the best research," McFarland said.

McFarland
ASSISTANT PROFESSOR OF MARKETING

McFarland's areas of research include personal selling, influence and persuasion techniques, channel coordination and emotional decision processes.

His work has been published in publications such as the Journal of Marketing.

McFarland also received the best paper award at the 2005 LaLonde International Seminar on Marketing Communications and Consumer Behavior. About 30 or 40 papers were submitted at this particular conference.

The articles were reviewed by other researchers and then a committee selected the winner.

K-State's spring Ralph Reitz Award for outstanding contributions to teaching was also presented to McFarland.

This award was meaningful, he said, because he was nominated by the students for this particular award, and had a number of student letters supporting his nomination.

Stephen Peters, assistant professor of finance, has received the College of Business Administration's Kansas State Bank Teaching Excellence Award.

Peters
ASSISTANT PROFESSOR OF FINANCE

Peters' area of research is information economics and his teaching subjects include corporate finance and financial institutions.

MEN | Poor shooting contributes to Wildcats' loss

"(Maric) started the game off well for them," Wooldridge said, "but we've seen that kind of thing before, and you ought to be able to adjust to it and get something done, but we weren't able to do that."

As bad as the first half was for K-State, the second half proved to be even worse. Not until sparingly-used guard Schyler Thomas hit a 3-point shot with 10:12 remaining did the Wildcats manage to hit their first field goal.

"Nebraska hit us a couple times right in the mouth, and we didn't respond," Wooldridge said. "They clearly were the tougher team. They clearly were the more aggressive and confident team. We had no answers for them in any shape or form."

K-State gave the Huskers a gift by missing its first seven shots from the field in the second half. Nebraska took advantage of that gift by jumping out to a 43-22 lead with 11 minutes, 33 seconds left in the game.

Turnovers	14	14

The 19-2 run the Wildcats fell victim to in the second half was not helped by the fact that they had accumulated seven team fouls in the first seven minutes of action.

By the time K-State was whistled for its 12th foul of the half with just under five minutes remaining, some of the 7,454 Wildcat fans already had begun quietly filing out of the arena. Nebraska used 14-of-21 shooting from the free-throw line in the final half to seal the victory.

Junior forward Cartier Martin, the Cats' leading scorer entering the game, was the only player to score in double figures for K-State, notching a game-high 20 points 4-of-14 shooting from the field. The next highest scorers for the Wildcats were guards Mario Taybron and Lance Harris with five points apiece.

Maric led the way for the Huskers, finishing with 15 points and 17 rebounds.

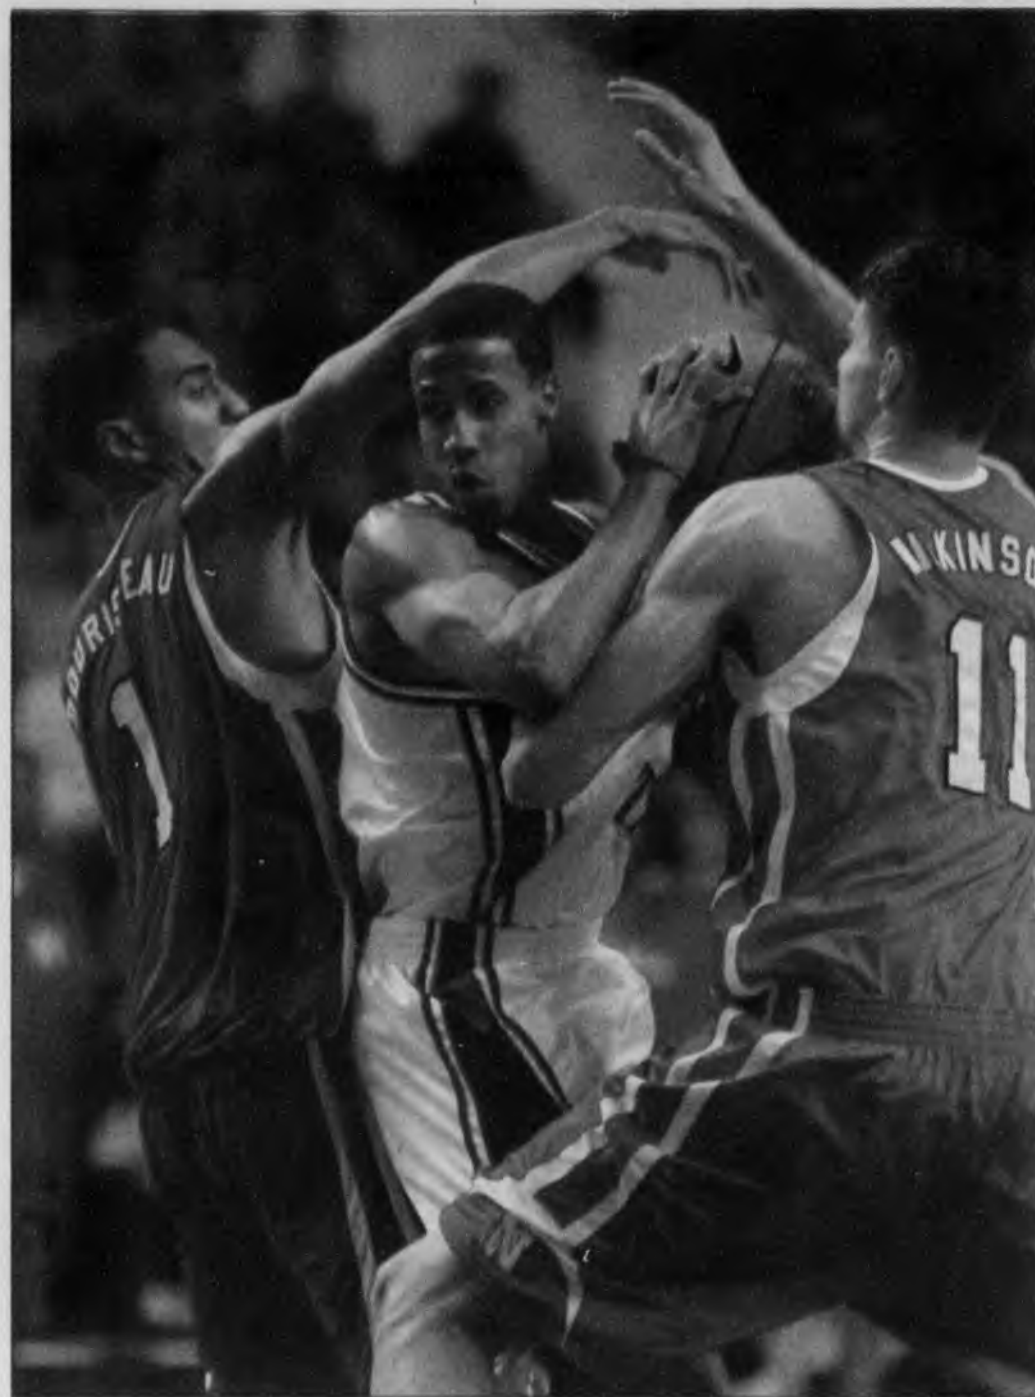

K-State sophomore David Hoskins, who came averaging 14.7 points per game, was held scoreless on the night after missing all four of his field goal attempts and going 0-of-2 from the free-throw line.

The Wildcats finished the night shooting 23.4 percent, the lowest percentage during the Wooldridge era at K-State.

K-State has little time to sulk, as it travels to Lawrence on Saturday to face a young Kansas team. The Jayhawks will put a seven-game winning streak on the line, after beating Colorado 75-63 Wednesday night in Boulder, Colo.

Wooldridge said he wasn't sure what his team could do to recover before Saturday's game.

"(We will) find out who wants to play," Wooldridge said.

USA Today Coaches Top 25 for the first time in since 1992, the team that had sports analysts, writers and fans predicting a trip to the NCAA Tournament in March and the team that some predicted could beat Kansas in Allen Fieldhouse, didn't show up.

Wednesday night's defeat also clipped K-State's 11-game winning streak at Bramlage.

Wooldridge offered no excuses for his players or himself. It was a loss he never imagined, he said.

"This league, it's about talent," Wooldridge said. "It's a very strong lead in terms of talent, but this league is equally about mental toughness and physical toughness and a competitiveness — it's a very difficult league to win in for everybody. I didn't see it coming, but maybe that's part of the problem as well."

There was nothing to say and no answers. That, in itself, was the most disturbing part of the situation for Wooldridge.

HCCI | New form features intention clarification manager of HCCI in Lawrence.

"It was confusing for everyone involved because it wasn't clear which notice should be carried out," Baker said.

There are two different versions of the noncompliance form: one used by landlords and one used by tenants. Each form includes an area where the person filing the complaint can explain their complaint in detail. If the breach cannot be remedied, the lease will be terminated.

The HCCI worked with landlords and law enforcement to create a new form that better interprets the law and clarifies the landlord's intentions, Kirkpatrick said.

"This makes it easy because it says this is a problem that can't be fixed so you need to get out," she said.

The HCCI is a nonprofit United Way agency which provides the community with counseling and education on budgeting, credit, debt repayment, tenant-landlord issues, and homeownership opportunities. The HCCI has offices in Topeka, Lawrence, Manhattan and Emporia, Kan.

Kealan Schroeder, senior in history, said the Landlord Noncompliance form seemed less confusing than the 14-30 form.

"I would definitely use it if I thought I needed it," she said.

Regina Schroeder, owner of Emerald Property Management in Manhattan, said the new forms will benefit landlords.

"It keeps everyone on the same page," she said. "It will help everyone to be sure that they word their notification legally."

bulk of which came on a 9:56 24-4 run.

"If we could just take away the first 10 minutes of the second half, I think we'd be in it," Hamlin said.

The Wildcats return to Bramlage Coliseum on Saturday to face the Colorado Buffaloes (6-9, 1-2).

"We've had a couple of really tough road games," Hamlin said. "I think it's going to be a lot nicer playing at home in our own surroundings."

KING | Son says father's dream not yet complete

"While we are a good nation, we are not yet a great nation," King said. "We still have obstacles to overcome, even in 2006."

King said there were certain aspects of his father's dream that have been achieved, but there is still work to be done.

He also spoke about the criminal system, which he stressed he did not call the "justice" system because he said the system does not promote homogenous justice across society.

The Morris Hill Chapel Choir sang "Lord, Help Me Hold Out," at the conclusion of King's speech, a hymn that set many in the audience clapping and swaying on their feet.

Afterward, the choir led the room in singing "We Shall Overcome."

For many present, the presentation was a moving one and once the ceremony was over many people hurried to meet King.

Mia Risher, Fort Riley resident, came to the front where King was greeting people.

"It was beautiful. I've never experienced anything like in my entire life," she said.

For some, like Junction City resident Mary Moore, hearing King speak brought back memories of the elder King.

"I think it was very interesting, very educational, and I can understand because I was there when the change was coming, even in the military," she said.

"His speech was wonderful. He sounds just like his father."

Inge Noa, fourth-grade teacher at Morris Hill Elementary School, was at the event with a group of third-, fourth- and fifth-graders.

She said her class has been studying the life of King Jr. and that they participated in the poster contest.

King's speech was punctuated by the deep spirituality that drove his father's passionate search for equality, and his commitment to non-violence, a commitment that the junior King reiterates.

King emphasized rejecting hatred and anger, even when concerning those who murdered his father and later, his grandmother.

"You love them because you know God calls you to that," he said.

E-MAIL | Business owners accept monitoring

The Constitution prohibits illegally gathered information to be used in court, Stapley said.

Some Manhattan business owners said they are more accepting of monitoring because they see the need for it.

"If it's in the country's best interest, it's OK," said Analiza Heaton, owner of Manhattan International Foods, 712 N. Third St.

Communications monitoring does not seem to be a concern with customers, Heaton said.

"I don't think they're worried," she said. "Maybe they are, but they don't talk about it."

Other business owners are worried about the ramifications to their customers.

Sarah Cunnick, co-owner of Sisters of Sound, 1214 C Moro St., said idea that the government could be reading her e-mail makes her nervous.

"Lord knows what the government reads into anything these days," she said.

Campaign attracts customers to city

By Holly Smith
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The Manhattan 24/7 advertising campaign was launched in October with a rotation of newspaper and radio advertisements, television commercials and direct-mail postcards.

Scott Benjamin, owner and executive chef of 4 Olives Wine Bar, which has been featured in many of the campaign's television commercials, said he is optimistic about the advertisements.

"It is hard to tell just how much it has helped, but I have noticed that there have been more customers coming in from out of town," Benjamin said.

Kristin Brighton, owner of Bright-Ward Communications, said the advertisements target people living within a 60-mile radius of Manhattan in an effort to attract new customers to Manhattan businesses.

"The original idea was to present Manhattan as a metropolitan, urban place that has things going on 24 hours a day, seven days a week," Brighton said. "We wanted to do something that was a step above anything that had been done before and something that people would be proud of."

Brighton worked alongside Susan Religa, owner of Susan Religa Marketing Services, in creating the campaign.

The campaign was funded by the City of Manhattan, Manhattan Area Chamber of Commerce and more

OSAS carnival gives students opportunities

By Kelsey Noel
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Students looking for a way to get involved at K-State this semester can explore their options at the Spring Activities Carnival from 6 to 8 p.m. Tuesday at the K-State Student Union.

This is the second year the Office of Student Activities and Services has sponsored the event for both semesters, said Bill Harlan, assistant coordinator of the Office of Student Activities and Services.

"Last year we began offering the carnival at the beginning of spring semester," Harlan said. "We decided to try it after receiving several requests from students. They realized how much spare time they had after experiencing fall classes, and they wanted another chance to view their options."

Harlan said he hopes the carnival will offer great opportunities to those students who have settled into university life and are ready to get involved.

Last spring's carnival attracted about 2,000 students, Harlan said, and he hopes for an even greater turnout this spring.

Besides having booths for more than 115 student organizations, the Union Program Council has an extra incentive for students to attend, Harlan said.

"The UPC is sponsoring free photo keychains during the activities carnival, where you can get your picture taken and put on the keychain. We'll sponsor live music as well," said Ben Hopper,

Evolving issue

Some fear science, religious debate is turning people away from Kansas

By Lacey D. Mackey
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The issue of evolution in Kansas has put a question mark in the minds of people across the nation, said John Staver, professor of education and director of the Center for Science Education.

"It raises questions in people's minds throughout the country if they should come to the state to work," Staver said. "If a couple had kids going to school, it would cause questions about how the school is going to teach science."

Staver said most of the scientific community agrees on the reliability of evolution and wonders why it cannot be taught in the classroom.

"Evolution, from a scientific perspective, is girded by evidence," he said. "For people who understand that and to hear about the questioning of evolution causes apprehension."

With constant talk of how to approach the issue of teaching evolution and other scientific theories, Staver said scientists' viewpoints can differ from the public's.

"Is there a controversy over the evolutionary theory? Yes, in the public's mind, but not in the scientific community," he said.

As a professor of education, Staver said he is worried about how the issue of teaching evolution affects instructors.

"I'm simply concerned that teachers will feel pressured and will downplay evolutionary concepts or omit them," he said. "It cheats the students from being able to understand and devalues the teachers."

Staver said one prominent issue for people is the fear that teaching a specific scientific theory will eclipse the choice of religious freedom.

"There is a group of people who believe that science and religion conflict," he said. "There are many people who are religious believers that don't think they conflict at all."

Larry Scharmann, professor of secondary education, said many Kansans don't see a problem with downplaying the teaching of evolution in an attempt to keep their children's values safe.

"On the first front, superficially, there are people who generally think, 'What's wrong with that?' because they don't want their children's views to be trampled on," he said. "This is not an ideological battle between atheist and Christian values. We're not actually trying to threaten students' values."

Scharmann said taking sides on the issue can be more frustrating than it has to be.

"You can't view it as right or wrong. Viewing it that way is going to give perpetual problems," he said. "If people ask if you are on one side or another, well, that polarizes it."

The number of secondary education science students has diminished about one-third to one-half in the last several years, Scharmann said.

Jayme Morris-Hardeman, Manhattan city commissioner and executive director of Sunflower CASA Project, Inc., said she has friends who have moved from Kansas and have witnessed the state's debate with fear that Kansas is getting a bad reputation.

"Statewide, I would think the debate has given a negative view of Kansas," Morris-Hardeman said. "It's not the first time we've seen this. That it's continued to be debated is still an issue."

With several friends who are scientists, Morris-Hardeman said many people do not see a conflict between their religious beliefs and scientific theories.

"I don't think they are exclusive," she said. "I think you can believe in both."

Pennsylvania evolution ruling may affect Kansas

By Megan Green
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

According to two K-State professors, you can disagree with science but you can't impose your religious beliefs in science classes.

"It's raising quite a lot of concern," Bharat Ratna, physics professor, said. "The faculty is concerned about what the school board is doing."

Nobody wants to go to a place where people impose their religious beliefs on others through science classes. It's stopping faculty from coming here."

U.S. District Judge John E. Jones III ruled it unconstitutional to teach intelligent design, the concept that certain features of the universe exhibit the characteristics of a product resulting from an intelligent cause, in science classes.

The Kansas School Board recently ruled that evolution will not be taught in science class and references to evolution in state education standards were removed.

School districts, school boards and citizens of Kansas, as well as the United States, have been discussing whether or not this is the right decision.

John Staver, director of the Center for Science Education and professor of education, said because the ruling from Pennsylvania is related to the decision made by Kansas, the ruling will affect Kansans.

"There is at least one part of that ruling that will directly affect Kansas," he said. "Why single out a single area such as evolution? They single out evolution for criticism. And what is the board's motivation? Religion?"

Ratna said he hopes the ruling will get the citizens of Kansas thinking about the issue and the credibility of the school board.

"I think it's going to convince people who are on the fence about the school board," Ratna said. "The school board is supposed to support education for kids in Kansas, and instead are imposing their religious beliefs in the classroom."

"Hopefully, the ruling will draw attention to what the school board is doing and get more people involved in the process, people who care about education for Kansas kids."

Ratna said he thinks it's important to teach evolution because it's the basis of biology and the basis of farming.

"We can't go around denying reality," he said. "It's pretty clear what they are doing in Kansas is unconstitutional according to a U.S. judge."

Julie Roller, senior in mass communications, said she fears that because of the Pennsylvania ruling, the Kansas ruling will be debated again and might persuade a few prospective students from coming to K-State.

"I think it's going to put us back in the limelight," Roller said. "It makes us look really unintelligent, and it's irritating because it's like the abortion debate; you just can't please everyone. It could really affect the student population if a student feels very strongly about the issue and decides not to come here because of it."

Since K-State is not a public school for grades one through 12, the ruling will not affect classes.

"K-State is not governed by a school board and that decision doesn't have that kind of impact on universities that it might have on public schools," said Larry Rodgers, associate dean of the College of Arts and Sciences. "It won't have any significance on what professors teach and don't teach about evolution."

The Pennsylvania ruling is among the most controversial evolution rulings since 1925, when a Tennessee high school teacher was convicted for teaching Darwin's theory of evolution.

"I think it's a thing people will always debate," Roller said.

University offers opportunities to honor King by volunteering

By Lacey D. Mackey
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The K-State Community Service Program will be providing a day of volunteer opportunities in honor of the life and service of Martin Luther King Jr. Monday.

Ten local agencies have partnered with the K-State Community Service Program in providing volunteer opportunities such as painting, trash pick-up, donation sorting and taking down holiday decorations.

The organization hopes for about 200 volunteers, including church groups and several fraternities and sororities, said

Sabra Schweger, administrative assistant for the K-State Community Service Program. "Everybody you volunteer for is so happy and grateful," she said. "It's a great way to honor Martin Luther King Jr."

The American Red Cross-Flint Hills Chapter also will provide a class called "An Introduction to Disaster Services" to prepare people assisting in disaster relief, said Jason Lantz, director of operations at American Red Cross-Flint Hills Chapter.

"If something strikes Manhattan and they choose to respond, they will have the training to do so," he said.

Day volunteering

When: 10 a.m. to noon, 1 to 3 p.m.

Monday

Where: Center court, Manhattan Town Center, Third Street and Poyntz Ave. Transportation will be provided to community volunteer sites.

Lantz said the interest in disaster relief has increased after the Indian Ocean tsunami in December 2004 and the record-breaking 2005 hurricane season.

In the spirit of Martin Luther King Jr., Lantz said the American Red Cross-Flint Hills Chapter also will provide an overview of several African-Americans who played major roles in the history of the American Red Cross.

Casey Kimmel, program development director for the Boys and Girls Club of Manhattan, Inc., said volunteers will hand out information about the club's casino night and silent auction fundraiser to businesses throughout Manhattan.

Kimmel said other volunteers will work around the facilities painting or cleaning.

"Sixty-five kids per day has a lot of wear and tear," Kimmel said. "It's nice to have volunteers."

Alito likely headed for justice confirmation

By Jesse J. Holland
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON, D.C. — Samuel Alito coasted toward confirmation as the 110th Supreme Court justice Thursday, ending 18 grueling hours of Senate interrogation with Democrats showing little appetite for a last-ditch filibuster attempt on the Senate floor.

"I am my own person, with whatever abilities I have and whatever limitations I have," Alito declared as he wrapped up his final public appearance before senators begin voting on his nomination.

Democrats contend the former Reagan administration lawyer is likely to swing the court to the right in replacing the centrist Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, who has provided decisive votes on such important issues as abortion, capital punishment and affirmative action.

Judiciary Committee senators are scheduled to meet next Tuesday to begin debating the 55-year-old federal judge's nomination. Chairman Arlen Specter, R-Pa., had wanted a committee vote then, but Democrats have talked of seeking a delay.

At the same time, Sen. Dick Durbin, a member of the committee and his party's second-ranking leader, suggested Democrats would not attempt to filibuster, which would require Republicans to gain 60 votes to advance the nomination.

With the hearings ending, interest groups rushed new television commercials to the airwaves.

Progress for America, which has close ties to the White House, plans to spend $250,000 to air a national ad beginning Friday that accuses Democrats of "partisan attacks" on Alito at the hearings.

IndependentCourt.org said it intended to counter with a commercial of its own.

Ads are not likely to change Alito's support among the Senate's 55 Republicans. GOP senators, both on and off the committee, praised Alito as his testimony ended.

"I enthusiastically endorse and support Judge Alito's nomination," Chuck Hagel of Nebraska said Thursday. Sen. Jeff Sessions, R-Ala., noted to the judge that his high school friends "predicted you would serve on the Supreme Court one day, and I think that's going to turn out to be a good prediction."

Chances of a nomination-crippling filibuster seemed to dim later, with two members of the "Gang of 14" — centrist senators who brokered a deal last year to avoid a filibuster showdown over judges — saying Alito's nomination does not deserve one.

TO THE POINT Volunteering important for community

Although K-State classes will not be in session Monday, K-Staters and the Manhattan community have the chance to celebrate "a day on, not a day off."

As K-State President Jon Wefald wrote in a letter in Thursday's Collegian, university students, faculty and staff are encouraged to participate in volunteer work in recognition of the life of Martin Luther King Jr.

The very spirit of volunteering – taking time out to help people and organizations in need – is at the center of King's legacy.

Monday is an opportunity for all members of the community to come together and help one another.

This can only serve to reinforce K-State's commitment to celebrating people from all walks of life, regardless of race, religion, gender, nationality and sexual orientation, and the numerous contributions they make the university and the city of Manhattan every day.

Get involved in a student organization.

Give your time to the Flint Hills Breadbasket, the Crisis Center Inc. or the T. Russell Reitz Regional Animal Shelter. Pay a visit to a total stranger living in a local nursing home. Just a few hours of your time can make a significant difference in the lives of others.

K-Staters nationwide are known for their community involvement and generosity. There perhaps is no better way to honor one of history's greatest leaders than to become a leader in your own school and town.

WRITE TO US

The Collegian welcomes your letters to the editor. They can be submitted by e-mail to letters@pub.ksu.edu, or in person to Kedzie 116. Please include your full name, year in school and major. Letters should be limited to 250 words. All submitted letters may be edited for length and clarity.

Waiting to wed

Columnist questions young brides, grooms

Every little girl dreams about her wedding day. In their minds, it's a day of exaggerations: violins, Barbie dolls in white dresses, and a beautiful, strong, white stallion carrying an equally beautiful, strong man.

However in most cases, it is typically advisable to stop being a little girl before one reaches this day. To unite in holy matrimony while still in a training bra most likely would create a whole host of both legal and emotional problems.

In recent years, though, it seems as if the median age for marriage creeps closer to the couple's graduation date.

I'm not one to judge love and the "right time," but this situation does raise a few questions, especially in light of an experience I recently had the horror of partaking in.

Over winter break, I took up the ball and chain of my old high school job, as a waitress at one of the nicer restaurants in my hometown.

The night before New Years Eve, a wedding reception was to take place in our ballroom.

This generally is a highly profitable situation, because wedding receptions equal alcohol, which equals drunken old men, and for a waitress who can paste on a smile throughout even the most vomit-inducing pick-up lines, it's pretty decent tip money.

Therefore, I was immensely excited to work the reception, until the climax of the evening: The moment the bride and groom entered the ballroom. I learned of not only their identities but the bride's age.

She was 19, exactly my age.

Cue the "Twilight Zone" music.

I felt goose-bumps rise on my arms and my tray of empty keg cups started to slide to the floor. She resembled someone who should be at her senior prom, not getting excited about her wedding night.

I began to picture myself: cutting my wedding cake, stuffing it in my husband's mouth and dutifully not gagging as the groomsman nudged themselves and winked while my new hubby pulled my garter off to toss.

That was the point when I began to feel sick.

There is absolutely no way on God's green earth that I am ready to begin that "never turn back" phase of my life. I'm still too busy growing up.

We can tell ourselves that, as college students, we're all finished with the growing process, but who are we kidding?

I still have too many majors to switch, too many nights to laugh about the next day and too many boxes of Pizza Shuttle to share with my roommates. I'm not ready to care that much quite yet. Getting married and starting a family is a huge goal of mine, but not until I accomplish the rest.

But perhaps this blushing bride already was there, with every goal met and no loose ends left untied.

But how will she ever know?

I don't think she gave herself time to find out. Instead, she just hopped on the fairy-tale bandwagon and had a wedding at which she couldn't even legally drink.

So when is the "right age" to get married?

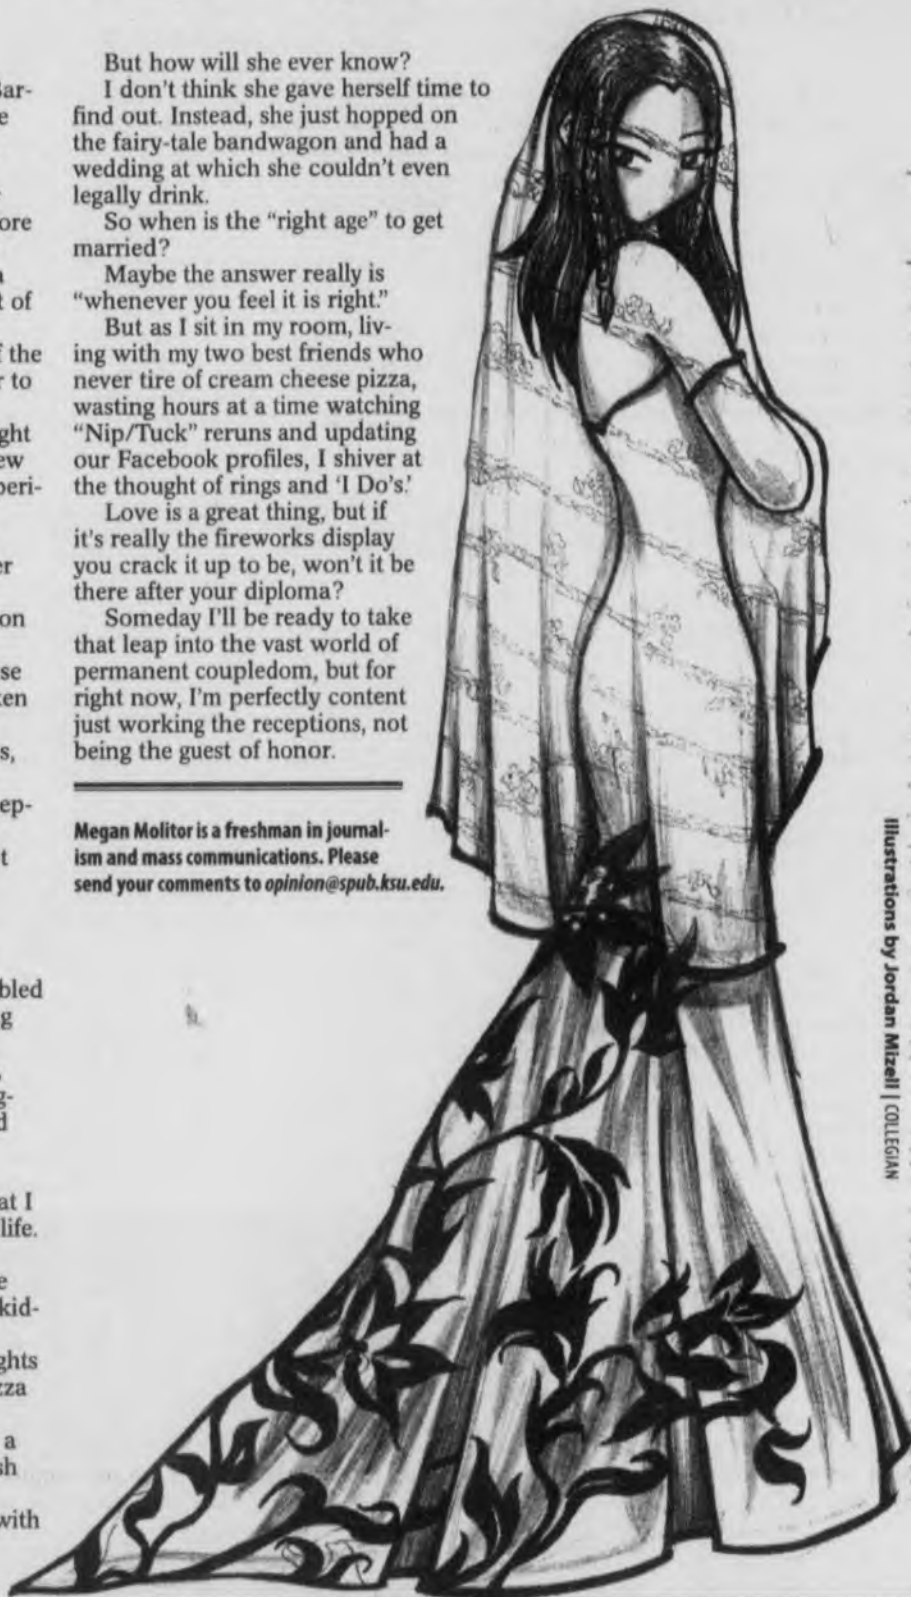

Maybe the answer really is "whenever you feel it is right."

But as I sit in my room, living with my two best friends who never tire of cream cheese pizza, wasting hours at a time watching "Nip/Tuck" reruns and updating our Facebook profiles, I shiver at the thought of rings and 'I Do's.

Love is a great thing, but if it's really the fireworks display you crack it up to be, won't it be there after your diploma?

Someday I'll be ready to take that leap into the vast world of permanent coupledom, but for right now, I'm perfectly content just working the receptions, not being the guest of honor.

Reading essential for learning

I was once told by one of my wisest teachers that you should always be responsible for your own learning.

I was told this when I was a sophomore and again as a senior in high school. However, it wasn't until recently that those words actually began to mean something.

As a pretentious and non-conforming college freshman, I did homework scantily, avoiding all assignments that were strictly reading and didn't include comprehension questions or even the slightest threat of a pop quiz.

Basically, if I wasn't physically required to crack a textbook, I usually didn't.

I relied solely on class lecture notes for study aids before tests.

My vacant approach was somewhat successful for my first round of exams. However, I remember getting really perturbed at test questions that didn't come directly from the lecture notes.

I thought teachers had a lot of nerve presenting students with questions related to the text. I used to believe it was ludicrous for professors to ask students about information that wasn't discussed during class, and my grades began to steadily decrease.

It was a couple of months into my first year that my teacher's quote began to haunt me.

I slowly started to realize that the tens of thousands of dollars my parents were bequeathing to K-State weren't intended to fund an expensive baby-sitting service but invariably were an educational investment.

My parents actually are paying lots of money for me to – hopefully – become somewhat of an expert in an academic area.

It was shortly after I made that realization that I came up with the hypothesis that the most successful students become experts in their fields because they are responsible for their own learning.

Instead of using textbooks as doorstops or firewood, these advantageous students actually thoroughly read the books for which they shell out hundreds of dollars.

From this, I have come to the conclusion that average college students don't read enough. This includes both school work and leisure material.

It's a professor's job to tell students their reading workload for school. So, for outside reading, I've mathematically attempted to come up with a simple algebraic formula that will help students figure out how much more they should be reading.

For every TV show students watch per week, they should read that many books per month, outside of normal reading. News programs and PBS are excluded in the equation, as they might prove to have some educational benefit. Shows that air in syndication, such as "Full House" on Nick at Nite each night, should be divided by two.

For example, if Joe McCool watches "Boston Legal," "Desperate Housewives" and six episodes of "Star Trek" weekly, he should read five extra books each month.

Although there is no guarantee, if students follow these simple guidelines perhaps they will become smarter and have an edge over fellow students that have become fallen zombies to television.

Therefore, in the words of A. Bitterman, in a campaign to encourage youth to embrace literature, "Read dammit!"

Clinician cares for AIDS patients

Local woman offers support, day-to-day living assistance to dozens of Riley Countians

By Kaley Lyon
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Donna Hart has devoted her career to assisting local citizens who have been diagnosed with HIV. Hart serves about 40 clients in a seven-county region, taking it upon herself to assist her clients in every aspect of their lives.

"It's a different aspect of nursing, that's for sure," Hart said.

Hart has been a full-time case manager for the Riley County-Manhattan Health Department Community AIDS Resource and Evaluation Clinic since 1992.

The program only had one or two clients when it was founded in the early 1990s, but today the clinic serves about 40 clients. The clinic takes care of clients in Riley, Marshall, Clay, Morris, Washington, Geary and Pottawatomie counties.

Hart's service for HIV patients is the only one of its kind within the area, said Kathy Dickey-Wilson, registered nurse and clinic supervisor for Riley County-Manhattan Health Department.

"I know years ago they were kind of just out there alone trying to pull all of their services together and not doing a very good job," Dickey-Wilson said. "This (service) allows them to have a home place to help coordinate their services."

Hart visits with HIV patients both in their homes and at the Riley County-Manhattan Health Department, and does everything from drawing blood to ensuring adequate nutrition. She also addresses disease prevention, mental health/substance abuse and how to prepare a patient to inform family members of his or her disease are also topics she addresses.

"I help people in all aspects of their life. The two main things I first ask when I meet a new client are, 'Are you safe at home?' and 'Do you have a home?'" Hart said. "I also ask, 'Do you have enough food to eat?' and look after the basic human needs."

The frequency of visits Hart makes is based on acuties, or how much care each individual patient requires.

However, since the program is funded by the state, there are certain mandates that must be followed.

She is required to check on her patients, to document the checkup at least once every three months, and she also attends training every year.

her own safety, her daughter Renee Hoelzel said Hart has no reason to worry.

"She's been in the nursing field for so long that she knows how to take the right precautions," Hoelzel said. "She knows what she's doing and everybody trusts her."

There are more people in this area who have the disease, Hart said, but to qualify for the program, candidates must live 300 percent below Riley County's Poverty level.

No doctor referral is needed for program qualification, but a blood sample may be required to determine the di-agnosis, she said.

The local care clinic has been made possible because of legislation signed Aug. 18, 1990, which established a federal program designed to improve the quality and availability of care for HIV patients and their families.

This program, the Ryan White Comprehensive AIDS Resources Emergency Act (or CARE Act), is administered by the Health Resources and Services Administration, which is within the U.S. Department of Health and Human Services.

Ryan White was diagnosed with hemophilia shortly after birth and contracted HIV through a blood transfusion. He decided to stand up for himself after years of mistreatment from his school district and community after his diagnosis at age 13.

"He basically stood up and said, 'this has got to stop,'" Hart said. "He and his family went to the government, but he passed away before his action became official."

Though White died of AIDS in 1990, the legislation that resulted from his lawsuit continues to provide hope for citizens nationwide who are afflicted with HIV or AIDS.

The CARE Act is divided into three titles in the state of Kansas. Title I is the Kansas City, Kan. Area Title II consists of more rural areas, including Riley County, and Title III consists of the Wichita area.

Through the Ryan White CARE Act, each state receives annual funding based on the number of HIV/AIDS cases within the state.

Between the CARE Act funding and other grants, the Kansas Title II program receives a few million dollars, Hart said.

NFL home teams will prevail this weekend

Football fans around the nation are gearing up for three weeks from today.

WENDY HAUN

Even people who don't pay attention to sports will know what event that is. No, I'm not talking about the lighting ceremony for the 2006 Torino Winter Olympics. I'm talking about Super Bowl XL.

This year, we see the familiar candidates (New England, Indianapolis, Pittsburgh) and the not-so-familiar (Washington, Seattle, Chicago).

This weekend is the divisional championships, and I'm here to give you the scoop.

Saturday, we have one National Football Conference matchup — Washington at Seattle — and one American Football Conference matchup — New England at Denver. Both home teams are 8-0 at home, and the Pats are 5-3 as an away team, while the Redskins are 4-4 away.

Sunday is the AFC battle between the 14-2 Indianapolis Colts and the 11-5 Pittsburgh Steelers. This one will be a battle royale to the end, with the Colts boasting a 7-1 home record and the Steelers posting a 6-2 away record. Most likely, this will turn out to be the game to watch this weekend.

Following the Colts-Steelers game is the second NFC contest featuring Carolina (11-5) and Chicago (11-5).

The Bears have a 7-1 home record and the Panthers have a 6-2 away record. In recent years, Chicago (WHO) has gone below .500 for the year (the only exception being 2001 when it went 13-3 and won the NFC North crown).

However, the Bears have surprised everyone this year, with rookie Kyle Orton leading the offense by passing for 1,869 yards and nine touchdowns. On defense, six-year veteran linebacker Brian Urlacher leads the team with 122 tackles and six sacks.

A team with few problems this year is Indianapolis.

Peyton Manning, who has passed for 3,747 yards and 28 touchdowns this season, has made it look easy. He completely picks opposing defenses apart with the help of running back Edgerrin James (1,506 yards and 13 TDs) and wide receiver Marvin Harrison (82 receptions for 1,146 yards and 12 TDs).

The Super Bowl should be a battle of the third-best offense in the country in the Colts, and the second-best defense in the Bears.

While the Bears have looked strong this year, I have faith in the Colts and Manning. Manning will be stellar as usual, and well rested from the week off. This is the game Indianapolis has prepared for all year. They aren't going to screw it up. Colts win the Super Bowl, 35-21.

Women prepare for Colorado

By Matt Gorney
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

After a dismal showing Wednesday night against Texas A&M, the women's basketball team is home preparing to face Big 12 Conference North foe Colorado at 7 p.m. Saturday.

"We're just youthful. Being put into positions that are new to us and getting wins on the road in the Big 12, no matter who you are, is very, very challenging," coach Deb Patterson said. "We're just somewhat inexperienced but I believe capable of figuring it out and answering the call."

K-State (11-3) enters the match posting a 1-2 conference record but is coming off a two-game skid with losses to Missouri and the Aggies.

Colorado (6-9) matches the Wildcats in conference record at 1-2 and comes to Bramlage Coliseum after handing the Kansas Jayhawks their second season

Big 12, I just know it's not the bottom.

"Right now, the way this league is going, numbers mean nothing, so we're taking Colorado very seriously, and I know they're going to take us just as seriously."

Coach Jim Wooldridge knows he should be looking ahead to K-State's game on Saturday against the Kansas Jayhawks in Lawrence.

At the same time, he isn't ready, or willing, to move past Wednesday night's 57-42 loss to Nebraska at home.

"I know you want to talk about KU and all that," Wooldridge said in a teleconference Thursday, "but the only thing on my mind is K-State."

Wooldridge has his hands full.

By 12:30 p.m. Saturday, he has to identify what needs mending within his team and how to compete against a KU (10-4, 1-0) squad that is coming off a seven-game winning streak, including a blowout against then No. 19 Kentucky.

Right now, though, Wooldridge is funneling his attention to internal problems.

"There are things that need to be fixed and addressed before we look at anything else," Wooldridge said. "We can't be the opponent. KU's the opponent."

Track and field travels to Arkansas for weekend invitational

By Chris Carpenter
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Despite his team's strong performance at the KSU Invitational, coach Cliff Rovelto was left with a slew of questions this week.

Today, K-State will get a chance to impress him at the Arkansas Invitational in Fayetteville, Ark.

"That's the same facility that the NCAA Indoor Championships are held in," Rovelto said.

"So it's an opportunity for those who will be competing in that meet to get a chance to see that facility.

"Also, we'll have an opportunity to see some people we don't normally get a chance to compete against until the end of the season."

The competition at the invite will be significantly higher than last week's.

Arkansas' freshman class was ranked the best in the nation by Track and Field News last month.

On the same list were the K-State freshmen, who were ranked No. 4 by the publication.

"Who knows how accurate those lists are," Rovelto said. "Many of the freshmen on that list won't even compete this weekend."

"I doubt we'll be able to verify that one way or the other."

One of those freshmen, Scott Sellers, beat out senior Kyle Lancaster in the high jump with a jump of 7-2 1/2, provisionally qualifying him for the NCAA Championships.

"That was a really good way for me to start off the season," Sellers said.

The product of Katy, Texas, set the national high school indoor record in the high jump as a senior with a jump of 7-5, which would tie with Lancaster for second all time on the K-State record board.

While most attention has been directed toward K-State's touted freshman class, it's a senior who is attracting interest this season.

The Manhattan Arts Center will celebrate the hilarity of the famous British Comedy troupe "Monty Python" tonight and Saturday evening.

The show features selections from Monty Python favorites such as "The Meaning of Life," "The Holy Grail," and the popular television series "The Flying Circus." The performance runs about two hours with two intermissions and includes a donation bar.

The selections or different "skits" known to Monty Python enthusiasts are linked together by a multimedia presentation on stage, which features the animation synonymous with Monty Python that made it so famous in the inception of its revolutionary television series.

Ryan Mott, a regular performer at the arts center, is featured in several of the selections, including "Philosophy for Two," in which his character suggests bits of pop culture and passes them off as philosophy for patrons to discuss. This is Mott's eighth production at the arts center.

"The great thing about the M/C is that you can experience every aspect of theater you are interested in," Mott said. "They are always welcoming to new faces who would like to help."

Unpredictably hot: Foxx begins year with hit album

"Unpredictable"

Album review by Sheila Ellis

Actor/comedian and now artist for J records, Jamie Foxx is best known for his Oscar-winning role in the movie, "Ray," but his new album "Unpredictable" brought the New Year in with a bang.

With its Dec. 20 release date, Foxx already has set records according to Nielsen SoundScan. He kicked off the new year as the first artist to premiere as No. 1 on the Billboard Top 200 Album Chart of 2006.

From "Slow Jamz" with Twista and Kanye West to

"Gold digger," also with Kanye West, many fans already seen Foxx's musical ability to croon on these hooks.

"Unpredictable" is indeed something refreshing, bringing hip-hop heads and R&B lovers together with fast club bangers and slow love songs, from seductive songs like "Do what it do" to emotional ballads like "Love changes" featuring Mary J. Blige.

This album proves once and for all that Foxx is multi-talented.

He can make you laugh with his comedy, make you cry with his serious acting and make you dance with his smooth hits.

Courtesy art

Foxx showcases his writing ability on this album with ballads like, "I wish you were here," a song he wrote about his grandmother who passed away. Foxx also demonstrates his classical piano training with songs like "Heaven" where listeners can hear Foxx tickling the ivories.

The many collaborations on this CD just add to Foxx's talent with the help of many hip-hop heavyweights including producer Timbaland and Jazze Pha. According to <http://thebosh.com> Foxx said these collaborations all came together naturally.

"Those are my friends," he said. "These are people I've formed relationships with over the years, thrown parties for, hung out with."

This is not Foxx's first musical effort.

His first album came out in 1994 entitled "Peep This" but did not do very well in the music world.

Foxx has given it one more try, and it looks like the crowd may be feeling him. The critics were very indecisive about this album and were not very supportive, but it looks like the critics were wrong.

Foxx said, "I've been working on music for the last 15 years. I don't do nothing sideways. If I'm gonna get it, I'm gonna get it 100 percent."

With smooth finger-snapping and head-bopping grooves, from hip-hop bass-bumping bangers to slowing it down and grabbing your sweetie on to the dance floor jams, Foxx has a winner.

This album is one you can put in and play the whole way through.

Post-Snyder merchandise sales soar

By Sheila Ellis
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Manhattan retail stores reported a significant growth in their holiday retail sales of K-State gear after the retirement announcement of former head football coach Bill Snyder.

Varney's Book Store, 623 N. Manhattan Ave., has been selling out of coach Snyder memorabilia as soon as it hit the shelves, Varney's owner Steve Levin said.

"A Coach Snyder T-shirt versus a K-State T-shirt is selling 50-to-1," Levin said. "A lot of people are making sure that they have a piece of Snyder to remember all of the great things he has done for K-State."

The K-State Super Store also has seen an increase in sales with Snyder's retirement, said Sarah Zimmerman, retail supervisor at the K-State Super Store, 520 McCall Road.

Zimmerman said the business does not have dollar amounts on sales yet because of inventory still in process.

Items for sale included Snyder T-shirts, books and the two-disc DVD set "Thanks, Coach!"

Ballard Sporting Goods owner Becky Ballard said she saw some increase in sales during the holiday season. Ballard Sporting Goods, 1218 Moro St., was unable to get Snyder T-shirts for the Nov. 19 football game because of licensing restraints, Ballard said.

Wildcat fans showed their support for Snyder by wearing Wildcat gear to Snyder's final game Nov. 19 against Missouri.

"The day of the game, people were coming in asking for Coach Snyder apparel to wear to the game," Maureen Thomson, a clerk at Ballard Sporting Goods said.

Wearing K-State gear to the games creates an atmosphere for the home field advantage, Dan Kuhlman, senior in biology said.

"It creates a psyche for the players and a purple sea of supporting fans," he said.

Grandmother has visitation rights

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

OREGON, Mo. — A woman who found her eight-months pregnant daughter lying in a pool of blood, her womb slashed open and the baby gone, has been given the right to spend more time with the child.

But Becky Harper will not be able to tell the toddler, Victoria Jo, about the day she was born.

Lisa Montgomery, 37, of Melvern, Kan., faces trial in April on a federal charge of kidnapping resulting in death.

Prosecutors are seeking the death penalty against Montgomery, who is accused of strangling 23-year-old Bobbie Jo Stinnett with a rope on Dec. 16, 2004, at her Skidmore, Mo., home, using a kitchen knife to perform a crude Caesarean section.

Victoria Jo was recovered a day later after authorities tracked down Montgomery through e-mails she had sent Stinnett about buying a dog. Victoria Jo now lives with her father, Zeb Stinnett, in Maitland, six miles south of Skidmore.

Harper said Stinnett reduced the amount of time she could spend with the child because of a falling-out between the two adults. In late July, Harper filed a petition in Holt County Circuit Court demanding more time with the girl.

Stinnett responded to the petition in August, stating that he only temporarily cut Harper's time because her behavior had become "bizarre," and that she had broken into his house to get some items. Harper has said she did not break in but had a key and was entitled to her daughter's things.

Under the four-page visitation plan that Judge William Richards approved Tuesday, Harper will be able to visit Victoria Jo one full weekend each month, on various holidays and on extra days in the summer.

Psychology professor to lead honors program

By Ashleigh Williams
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

K-State psychology professor Stephen W. Kiefer has been selected to lead K-State's new All-University Honors Program.

Provost M. Duane Nellis formed a task force that developed the program and selected Kiefer as the University Honors Director.

"Steve has served very effectively for a number of years as head of the psychology department and is excited about leading our university-wide honors efforts," Nellis said.

Kiefer said he has been involved with the Arts and Sciences honors program since he came to K-State in 1982.

"I've served the administrative role of psychology department head since 1996, providing me with the opportunity to develop my skills in this arena," Kiefer said. "But more than anything, I think my joy in working with students is going to be very important. This is a program designed for students, and anything I can do to help them reach their full potential will be done."

In addition to being head of the psychology department, Kiefer has been recognized for his teaching and research.

He won K-State's Presidential Award for Teaching Excellence in 1996 and the Senior Faculty Award for Research Excellence, Institute for Social and Behavioral Research the same year.

M. Duane Nellis
PROVOST

In 1989 and 1990, Kiefer received the Williams L. Stamey Teaching Award from the College of Arts and Sciences. With his previous experiences, Kiefer said he feels he is prepared for his role in the all-university honors program.

The program essentially has three parts that students must accomplish, according to the K-State Honors Task Force Report.

The first is the core curriculum where students are introduced to the honors program. The second part of the program is where students take honors courses based on the college in which they are studying. They finish with an independent honors project.

"The university-wide honor program will create unique opportunities for our students," Nellis said, "and allow us to implement a variety of new initiatives. It will give us excellent opportunities to measure our top students' learning, which will help meet our university-wide assessment goals, and give our honors program students the kind of self-reflective education that best prepares them for post-graduate work and study."

With everything looking optimistic, Kiefer said he has strong hopes for the program.

"We have everything in place to help this program succeed: high quality students, exceptional faculty, and supportive administration. With everyone working together, we can develop a flagship program that has benefits for all of the involved constituents," Kiefer said.

Student to open Daylight Donuts

By Lola Shrimplin
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

A morning desire for doughnuts has led Anthony Moeder to open his own Daylight Donuts store at 1101 Moro St.

"I woke up, looked in the phone book, and the closest stores were in Ogden and Wamego, and they were going to be closed by the time I got there," Moeder, sophomore in computer engineering, said.

After researching how to open a business, Moeder decided to open his store at the former site of Aggieville Liquor.

Moeder said his parents helped with loan finances and he hopes the store will help fund his education.

"It's pretty much going to be my ticket to college," he said.

While Daylight Donuts won't open for another few weeks, Moeder said he has big plans for the business. He said he has plans for hiring employees but is not at that stage yet.

Milk, energy drinks, fountain drinks and a gourmet coffee machine are included in his plans for the doughnut shop.

There will also be wireless Internet access and furniture, he said.

"I want to try to create an atmosphere that will appeal to students," he said.

He said he plans to have the store open from noon to 1 a.m.

Expanded gambling might help halt tax increases

By Carl Manning
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

TOPEKA — For lawmakers facing a court mandate to increase school funding, a few more casinos and slot machines in the state could be a good way to avoid an election-year tax increase.

Even so, some think the chance of any gambling bill reaching Gov. Kathleen Sebelius is slim because of a greed factor that has doomed similar proposals.

The idea of expanded gambling isn't new, although many lawmakers feel it has a better chance this session because of a Kansas Supreme Court finding last year that the state is not meeting its constitutional obligation to provide adequate public education for students. A legislative audit this week said at least an extra $400 million is needed to do that.

The question is where legislators are going get that money. Sebelius' $11.7 billion budget proposal didn't address the issue, leaving it to lawmakers to figure it out.

Legislators say a tax increase isn't likely. That leaves gambling as an option.

"We need to consider expanded gaming again unless people want a tax increase," Sen. John Vratil, R-Leawood, said Thursday.

But some don't think more gambling is a good idea.

"Do you want to tell your kids their education is funded by something we don't want them to do? Is that the way we want to fund our children's education in Kansas?" said Sen. Nick Jordan, R-Shawnee.

Staffers are drafting a gambling bill for the Senate Federal and State Affairs Committee, and Chairman Pete Brungardt says it should be ready for hearings in a couple of weeks. He hopes to get the measure through the Senate by the session's midpoint in late February.

"If it's going to fit into the budget picture, you want it where people can see it," Brungardt said.

Unlike previous years, this version is more limited — one casino in the Kansas City area and another in southeast Kansas, plus slot machines at pari-mutuel tracks in Kansas City, Frontenac and Wichita. Kansas already has four American Indian casinos, in addition to the state lottery and dog tracks.

"Most of the support is for the fewest locations, and that should be the focus of the discussion," Senate Majority Leader Derek Schmidt said.

The greed factor — pressuring legislators for a larger expansion and causing interest groups to fight over slices of the profits — derailed previous gambling bills as lawmakers attached amendments until they died under their own weight.

"It gets to be a circular firing squad," said Brungardt, R-

Salina. "If we're going to have a serious attempt at this, we're going to have to leave the bill reasonably intact."

He envisions 1,500 slot machines per track and 2,000 per casino. Operators would pay the state $15,000 per slot up front before they could operate. That money would be deducted from the state's share of future adjusted gross revenues — the amount left after paying winnings.

The up front money could generate as much as $127 million for the budget year beginning July 1, Brungardt said.

turnovers, which resulted in 32 Aggie points.

"(Texas A&M is) a great one-pass denial basketball team, and really the sort of the word of the night for me was 'too quick,'" Patterson said. "That 'too quick,' generally speaking, led to disastrous results."

Scoring also has been a problem for the Cats, as they've only shot a combined 33.7 percent in their last two games.

"We're a great three-point shooting team. We're just going to have to get used to being guarded, denied and getting ourselves open for really good shots," junior Claire Coggins said. "I'm not worried about those (shots) going in — we've just got to work on knowing that our defenders are going to be all in our grill the whole time."

Even after two straight conference losses, K-State returns home ready to add more wins to its record.

"I love the disposition of our basketball team as we approach the next day," Patterson said. "It's difficult to lose games, whether you're experienced or inexperienced, on the road or not. It's the nature of being a competitor."

"I really love the fact that this team comes back. They're focused, they bring great energy to it, and they understand this is a process."

stacked against the Wildcats in Saturday's contest, the Wildcats can't afford to play against themselves, Wooldridge said.

This season, K-State is 0-3 on the road, and Kansas will have the home-court advantage with 16,000-plus fans at Allen Fieldhouse. Wooldridge has yet to win against the Jayhawks, and K-State hasn't been victorious against KU since they beat the Hawks in 1994 in Lawrence, 68-64.

Wooldridge said his inability to beat Kansas carries little weight on his shoulders, but he has acknowledged the talent of this young, scrappy Kansas team.

"They have terrific athletes, very physically stringent, and they play tough defense," Wooldridge said. "They're the real deal, in that regard. They're getting better and better as the season continues."

Stopping freshman standout Brandon Rush — who is averaging 13.1 points per game for KU — will be a priority for the Cats, but as of Thursday afternoon, Wooldridge hadn't assessed how to do that.

He also said it would be difficult to prepare for a Kansas squad where roughly seven players, like Christian Moody, Sasha Kaun and Mario Chalmers, have the ability to explode on any given day.

But Wooldridge's mind was elsewhere. He said he was still more concerned about his players' response to Wednesday's defeat, since he hadn't seen them since post-game Wednesday.

"The reaction I want is a group of kids who are more willing to listen, start the engine, be receptive, and hold themselves accountable for what we did last night," Wooldridge said. "I don't want to see any kids with a defeatist attitude or a bad attitude."

Mental toughness will be crucial for the Cats to play with Kansas and all teams in the Big 12. The only problem is finding the capacity to do so, Wooldridge said.

"You've got to dig in, dig down to who you are, find something special, and bring it to the forefront," Wooldridge said.

Players were unavailable for comment Thursday.

Turkey's government accused of slow response to bird flu

By Benjamin Harvey
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

DOGUBAYAZIT, Turkey — Local officials accused Turkey's government Thursday of moving too slowly to slaughter fowl when bird flu was still confined to birds, as the number of people infected with the deadly H5N1 strain climbed to 18.

Mukkades Kubilay, the mayor of Dogubayazit - where three siblings died a week ago - complained that Ankara had sent in only three doctors and that there were not enough workers to destroy poultry.

"It's an extraordinary situation," she told The Associated Press. "There aren't enough workers. We don't have enough technical people ... We're trying to do it on our own."

National health and agriculture authorities denied they did too little, too late, to contain the outbreak, which was discovered in poultry in December.

"Whoever says that we've responded too slowly has ill intentions," Health Ministry spokeswoman Mine Tuncel said.

Agriculture Minister Mehdi Eker insisted there was no delay in responding to the first reports of infected birds on Dec. 15 and culling of poultry began immediately. "The fight against this disease had been pursued through a clear and transparent policy," he said.

Questions about whether the government acted aggressively enough early in the outbreak emerged as officials tried to contain the disease, which Eker said had been confirmed in 11 of Turkey's 81 provinces and was suspected in 14 others.

European Union experts also urged nations bordering Turkey to step up checks on any possible spread of the bird flu outbreak and prepare measures to control the disease.

Turkish health authorities, meanwhile, raised the number of people infected with H5N1 from 15 to 18, after it turned up in preliminary tests on two people hospitalized in southeastern Turkey and in a lung of an 11-year-old girl who died last week in the same region. The girl was the sister of two teenagers who became the first fatalities outside East Asia, where the strain has killed 76 people since 2003.

Although three of the 18 people confirmed with the virus have died, several others are in stable condition or show few signs of illness, suggesting the virus may not be as deadly as had been believed. Previously, more than half of those confirmed to have contracted the disease died.

Eight-year-old Sumeyya Mamuk, who became infected with bird flu after embracing dying pet chickens, was released from a hospital in the eastern city of Van on Thursday.

Health Minister Recep Akdag was optimistic. "The EU and the world will see Turkey put its signature on a great success," he told the Cihan news agency. "The fact that we have handled the affair from the onset with openness and determination is a clear indication."

The World Health Organization reported Thursday that a full genetic analysis of samples from Turkey had shown no meaningful changes to the DNA of the virus amid fears it could mutate into a strain easily passed between people and trigger a pandemic.

Most human infections have been linked to direct contact with sick poultry, including both of the latest victims, who the Health Ministry said came from southeastern provinces of Siirt and Sanliurfa.

Authorities said 355,000 birds had been slaughtered nationwide as a precaution, including 27,000 in Dogubayazit/

345 die from stampede during stoning ritual

By Salah Nasrawi
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

MINA, Saudi Arabia — Thousands of Muslims surging to complete a stoning ritual before sunset stampeded Thursday after some pilgrims tripped over dropped luggage, causing a pile-up that killed at least 345 people in the second tragedy to hit this year's hajj.

Saudi authorities have sought for years to ease the flow of increasingly mammoth crowds during the annual Islamic pilgrimage, but the deaths on the final day of the stoning of the devil ritual underlined the difficulty in managing one of the world's biggest religious events, which this year drew more than 2.5 million followers.

The stampede came a week after another hajj disaster - the Jan. 5 collapse of a building being used as a pilgrims' hotel that killed 76 people in Mecca.

In the ritual, all the pilgrims must pass a series of three "pillars" called al-jamarat, which represent the devil and which the faithful pelt with stones to purge themselves of sin.

The site in the desert of Mina outside the holy city of Mecca is a notorious bottleneck in the weeklong pilgrimage and has seen deadly incidents in seven of the past 17 years, including a stampede in 1990 that killed 1,426 people and one in 2004 that killed 244.

"I heard screaming and ... saw people jumping over each other," said Suad Abu Hamada, an Egyptian pilgrim. "Police starting pulling out bodies. The bodies were piled up. I couldn't count them; they were too many."

Brighton said the feedback from businesses has been positive.

"Everyone who has seen the materials has seemed really positive and very impressed with them," she said.

The Manhattan Area Chamber of Commerce will measure the campaign's effectiveness by studying sales tax revenue, input from sponsors, and shopping surveys before determining the future of the campaign, said Beverly Orr, project manager for the chamber.

If the campaign contin-

Despite early positive feedback, Brighton said she is unsure of the future of the Manhattan 24/7 campaign after its nine-month run.

"We are hoping that down the road there will be additional funding to do additional phases of the campaign because even nine months isn't enough," Brighton said. "It will take several years of repeating the same image to really change people's behaviors."

Billions cut from loan funds over time

By Eileen Laux
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

College students might soon be facing a large cut in student loans. Under the Deficit Reduction Act, almost $12.7 billion would be cut over the next five years.

Larry Moeder, director of admissions and student financial assistance, said the cuts will not affect students immediately.

He said the cuts may not be all bad because many lenders will be waiving the 3 percent origination fee and some students will not have it as soon as this summer.

Moeder said there is a provision to lock in a higher interest rate instead of keeping the variable that floats up each year.

"Students may have the opportunity to borrow more while in college, but after graduation interest rates may be higher, and it will cost more there," he said.

Moeder said more students will be affected in the future, and consolidations might be put in jeopardy.

"Any time there is an additional burden put onto the backs of students, that isn't a good thing," he said. "Students receive

Election deadline approaches

The deadline to file for student body elections is one month away.

Elections commissioner Tanner Banion said candidates must be enrolled in at least 12 credit hours at K-State with a minimum 2.0 grade point average, and graduate student candidates must be enrolled in at least 12 hours with a minimum 3.0 GPA.

Forms required for filing include an elections filing form for the appropriate position, elections expenditure form, receipt summary and elections contribution summary. Candidates also are encouraged to pick up the elections regulations code packet at OSAS or online, Banion said.

Positions available for filing are student body president and vice president; one-year terms for college councils; three, one-year terms and one-two year term for Student Publications Inc. Board of Directors; three, two-year terms and two-one year terms for Union Governing Board; and one-year term for Student Senate.

Students applying for board positions with Student Publications Inc. cannot be employed by an entity of student publications, and students applying for Union Governing Board positions cannot be employed by any entity of the K-State Student Union.

Dramane Diarra, 21; Tyler Hughes, 55; and other K-State players celebrate Saturday after beating Kansas. The win broke the 31-game winning streak Kansas had over the Wildcats that dated back to 1994.

Seniors Thomas and Diarra lead team to monumental victory at KU

By Nick Dunn
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

K-State coach Jim Wooldridge hugs junior forward Cartier Martin after K-State's 59-55 win over Kansas. Martin scored 14 points to help the Wildcats to their first conference win.

Schlyer Thomas knew his time was running out.

He knew his chances at beating Kansas, and ending K-State's 31-game losing streak to the Jayhawks, were quickly fading away.

For this reason, Thomas, a senior guard for the Wildcats, gathered his teammates together just before taking the court at Allen Fieldhouse, in an attempt to motivate them.

"I just grabbed the guys, and we huddled up, and I just talked to them as a friend," Thomas said. "I said, 'You know, guys, we've been losing to these guys ever since I've been here. This is my fourth year. We have to put a stop to it. We have to feel it in our hearts, and we have to believe that we can win this game, and just play hard every possession.' And they did it. They took it to heart."

Thomas' words obviously had an effect on the Wildcats, who managed to pull off an incredible 59-55 comeback victory that left the 16,300 Jayhawk-faithful in attendance stunned.

Little did Thomas know his words would be a spark plug in his team's monumental win.

In fact, Thomas and senior forward Dramane Diarra both proved to be unlikely heroes by helping to overcome a 12-point second-half deficit.

Thomas, who entered Saturday's game averaging a mere 2.0 minutes per game, saw his first action in the second half. With 10 minutes, one second remaining in the game, Thomas hit a three-pointer from the right wing, moving his season total for points to 11, and closing the gap to 45-39.

By no means did Thomas fill up the stat sheet on Saturday, but he did finish with five points on 2-of-2 shooting from the field, two rebounds and two assists. Perhaps most importantly, he committed no turnovers while handling the ball for 12 minutes in the second half.

It was a wonder Thomas was able to come off the bench and perform so well in such a hostile environment, but he said the crowd helped him play better.

"I've been here for awhile, so I feel kind of experienced," Thomas said. "The more people in the

Students, Manhattan residents volunteer

About 200 students and community members gave up their day off to honor the Rev. Dr. Martin Luther King Jr. by volunteering around Manhattan.

For the 21st year, the Kansas State Community Service Program organized a day for volunteer service with 10 local social service agencies.

"Service was important to Martin Luther King Jr., so I think this is one of the best ways to honor him," said Sabra Schweger, administrative assistant for Kansas State Community Service Program. "And it's not only a way to serve but it's a way to unite with other community members."

At the various agencies, volunteers in morning and afternoon shifts painted, raked leaves, built trails, sorted donations and participated in disaster relief training, Schweger said.

Bradley Shaw, associate professor of modern languages, spent the morning taking down holiday decorations along Poyntz Avenue with his wife.

"I think that it's an appropriate activity for the spirit of the day and the legacy of Dr. King," Shaw said.

Shaw said volunteering is less prominent today than it was when he participated in fall campus clean-ups as a student at an Oregon university.

"It was an activity in which we shared an experience," he said. "We need to find ways to go back to a sense of community."

After removing the decorations, Melissa Slack, freshman in mass communications, tied yellow support the troops ribbons to the trees lining Poyntz Avenue.

"I thought it'd be a nice way to spend my day," she said. "It's been kind of fun."

Students chosen to help with flight

By Leann Sulzen
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

In the next month, K-State-Salina students Patrick Rinearson and Nancy Milleret might only have a day and a half notice before they have to fly to England.

That is because Rinearson and Milleret, both seniors in professional pilot, are helping with the Virgin Atlantic GlobalFlyer "Ultimate Flight" mission control, which is based in Crawley, England, about one hour south of London.

"We're probably going to have 36 to 48 hours notice is my guess to pack and get over there," Rinearson said.

In the "Ultimate Flight," millionaire pilot Steve Fossett will attempt to set the aviation record for longest distance traveled by flying more than 26,000 miles in about 80 hours. The flight will take off from the Kennedy Space Center in Florida and land at Kent International Airport in England.

According to www.globalflyer.com, the conditions for take off will not be favorable until after Monday.

Jim Reed, senior in aviation maintenance, also was selected to help with the record attempt. Reed traveled to the Kennedy Space Center in Florida, where he will assist with the maintenance of the GlobalFlyer until takeoff. He also will help with post-flight recovery in England.

Reed was unavailable for comment.

This isn't the students' first experience with GlobalFlyer.

They were part of the 11 students who helped with mission control and maintenance during the first GlobalFlyer flight in March in Salina.

Then, Fossett set the record as the first person to fly solo nonstop around the world without refueling.

Milleret said her previous experience with GlobalFlyer has prepared her for her work with the "Ultimate Flight."

"In a way, it will be kind of a reunion," she said. "It will be fun."

K-State-Salina Dean of Technology and Aviation Dennis Kuhlman said in a K-State Media Relations and Marketing news release he was pleased Fossett selected Reed, Rinearson and Milleret.

"They proved their aviation skill and professionalism during the first GlobalFlyer project, and I am confident that, once again, each will represent our university extremely well," he said.

Long-time faculty member dies

By Alex Peak
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Faculty member John Johnson died Jan. 2 after a short illness.

Johnson began working for KSU Libraries in 1969. He had the positions of cataloger, associate professor, chair of reference and information services, assistant to the dean, and, since 1993, he specialized in government documents, according to a letter addressed to the faculty senate and university community on Hale Library's Web site.

Alice Trussell, director of the Fiedler Engineering Library, was a colleague of Johnson's since 1997 and said he was always very busy and extremely involved with the university.

"He was a very good librarian and an excellent library researcher," Trussell said. "And he absolutely loved horticulture."

He also was a member of faculty senate for four terms and Faculty Senate Committee on University Planning for several years. Johnson also served on many committees and a task force group for the university.

"I've known John since I came to K-State, and he was a great friend, excellent professor and superb librarian," President Jon Wefald said. "He was always cheerful and optimistic."

Johnson was born Aug. 22, 1945, in Manhattan. He went on to earn a bachelor's and master's degree in geography from K-State.

He is survived by wife Frances; daughters, Lesley Ketcham and Heather Johnson; and son, Stephen Johnson.

Johnson's family has established a memorial in his name at the K-State Botanical Gardens.

Manhattan City Commission to vote on service out of regional airport

By Logan C. Adams
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Travel out of Manhattan Regional Airport could be affected by the recommendation chosen by the Manhattan City Commission tonight.

The commission will make a request to the Federal Aviation Administration for the next two years of service through the Essential Air Service subsidy program, which has allowed for flights to and from the airport at lower prices for the past two years.

The commission will review the proposals submitted by three companies — Air Midwest, Inc., Multi-Aero, Inc., and Regions Air, Inc. — to operate flights out of Manhattan as a part of the federal Essential Air Service subsidy program. The new contract would take effect March 1.

Air Midwest, Inc., a subsidiary of Mesa Air Group, currently operates the daily flights from Manhattan to Kansas City, Mo., through US Airways.

City Manager Ron Fehr said it was the only one to submit proposals that met the criteria for the program.

"Regions Air's proposal was way too many dollars, and the other's didn't have large enough aircraft," Fehr said.

The current service includes three round-trip flights through Salina, Manhattan and Kansas City, Mo., on weekdays, one on Saturday and two on Sunday.

Fehr said Salina officials are asking to separate Manhattan's service from theirs.

City Commission

7 tonight at City Hall, 1101 Poyntz Ave.

He said the decision is ultimately up to the FAA, but the commission will be able to give their opinions on what option would be best for Manhattan to consider.

Commissioner Tom Phillips said the commission will likely want to have more trips each day. He said he also would like to see a connection to a large airline hub in the future.

"One of the challenges is that you can spend four or five hours waiting in Kansas City for a connecting flight," Phillips said.

TO THE POINT Basketball win could benefit entire university

Saturday against Kansas, the K-State men's basketball team released itself from 12 years of basketball bondage with its improbable 59-55 victory over the Jayhawks in Allen Fieldhouse.

Aside from taking the proverbial monkey off Coach Jim Wooldridge's back, beating Kansas could spell the beginning of better things for the Wildcat basketball program.

It was a win that could and should propel the Wildcats into postseason play should they build off of it in the coming weeks.

However, K-State fans should wait to pass judgment on Wooldridge or the team until the season is over.

The win not only ended K-State's streak of 31 consecutive losses to its in-state rival it could mean greater things for the university as a whole as well.

More than basketball wins and losses, K-State could benefit from larger crowds at the basketball games, more television exposure and more students choosing K-State over Kansas, all as a result of finally defeating the hated Jayhawks.

Sports teams, especially successful sports teams, have a way of starting a trickle-down effect throughout the whole university, and K-State's win over Kansas will hopefully begin the process.

To the point is an editorial selected and debated by the editorial board and written after a majority opinion is formed. This is the Collegian's official opinion.

Privacy invasion

Facebookers should be cautious of site use

Illustrations by Christina Forsberg
COLLEGIAN

College students in the '90s had it rough.

Imagine going to a party back then and meeting an attractive person of the opposite sex. The next morning, you can recall the face, greek house and major of your future beloved, but you can't remember schmoopie's name.

How could this problem be solved?

Our 20th-century friends would have been SOL, but luckily for us, a few clicks of the mouse and some online sleuthing can reveal much more than schmoopie's name — by logging on to Facebook.com, we can learn his or her hometown, high school, political affiliation, relationship status, phone number, date of birth and social security number.

Well, maybe not that last one, but it's only a matter of time. Facebook, the combination online student directory-message board-dating service-classified ads-procrastination tool, has become the ninth-most popular U.S. Web site based on page views, according to the Wall Street Journal. It's estimated that more than 80 percent of students at Facebook-friendly universities have created profiles, which makes for millions and millions of users.

Although Facebook is a favorite time-waster and information source for students around the country, some have begun to suspect it of ulterior motives.

The Web site was launched in February 2004 by Harvard wiz kid Mark Zuckerberg, and it spread like wildfire.

It operated on a fairly modest budget until receiving $12.7 million from venture capital company Accel, a company with various bloggers, pundits and quasi-journalists accused of having CIA ties.

Facebook is funded by the CIA? That's just a crazy conspiracy theory — right?

Well, maybe. Since its $12.7 million infusion from Accel, Facebook has added all kinds of nifty new features. Members now can upload entire photo albums of themselves and their friends, giving people a much clearer idea of what they look like. And even if you don't upload more pictures of yourself, your loving friends can do it for you, linking your profile to every single snapshot of you drunk in Aggieville.

Perhaps even more invasive are Facebook's loud demands of how members know each of their friends. They now can tell the world which friends they've lived with, had classes with or hooked up with, providing dates and locations to boot. For better or for worse, many students seem to lie or invent stories here. I, for example, did not actually spend 1977 living in a hut in Zimbabwe.

And, just days ago, Facebook unveiled social timelines. People now can see a year-by-year timeline of where others lived and worked, what organizations they belonged to, and who they dated and made friends with.

We've finally reached that scary day where there's a full online dossier about each of us, complete with all our contact information, everything we've done and everyone we know, and the ironic twist is that we've provided every bit of it voluntarily.

So, is the CIA behind Facebook?

I have no idea. Regardless, we should be careful about what information we make available.

There already have been stalking cases after students posted their addresses online and cases of employers not hiring applicants based on what they've posted on Facebook. A December 2005 Wall Street Journal article even detailed how Penn State University officials used Facebook photos to punish more than 50 students who stormed the football field after a big win in violation of university policy.

The bottom line is, we're living in an Information Age where every move can come back to bite us years down the road. Keep that in mind when uploading those photos of your latest five-minute keg-stand.

Torture essential for gathering intelligence

We hear that President Bush has signed on to Sen. John McCain's measure condemning torture. Haven't we something better to be doing?

Everybody with the IQ of a chicken opposes torture, yet torture persists.

Indeed, countless international laws banning torture have done little to eradicate it — Sen. McCain should know this well from his extended, and brutal, stay at the Hanoi Hilton.

Sadly, we must confess that torture is an effective tool in intelligence-gathering. Does this make torture desirable? Absolutely not.

But for those who are charged with extracting information from the enemy, the question of how much force is too much is one not easily answered.

Upon introductions, the average military intelligence interrogator does appear a knuckle-dragging gorilla. Most, following the law of averages, are, in fact, average. They, like the majority of us, enjoy a backyard cookout and the company of good friends.

However, when removed from the comforts of home, these men and women bear an unenviable burden: to what lengths do they go to retrieve intelligence?

The lives of soldiers, marines, sailors, airmen, and even those of us secure on American soil depend on the information the interrogator must extract.

The interrogator sees the screaming widow throwing herself on the flag-draped coffin and the glassy-eyed child asking, "When is daddy coming home?" and is confronted with the question, "What if I had tried harder?"

So they find themselves in a room with a man caught planting an improvised explosive device (IED). Odds are, he did not decide at random to become an insurgent. He was recruited by others. Odds are, this is not the first and only IED he has ever planted. He knows where more are.

You do your best, abide by the rules and get what you can. You emerge into a briefing room full of the sullen faces of men who, days ago, saw a friend and comrade turn into jagged bone and bloody meat during an ambush.

How much do you think they care about the rules concerning interrogation?

To them, rules concerning interrogation are something to be ducked, dodged and avoided.

While they make good sense in the land of the morning paper over coffee and danish, in the land of severed limbs and mutilated bodies, these rules are nothing but feel-good crap hawked off by bureaucrats vying for votes.

The reality interrogators must face is one of young men and women looking up at them with hopeful eyes.

The comfort and dignity of the other side is a low priority when you're trying desperately to put your best friend's intestines back into his abdomen.

The pictures of Lynndie England pointing at some guy's penis are of little concern to the husband, wife, mother, father, sister or brother that just saw the flag-draped box come off the plane with a tag that reads "human remains, do not view."

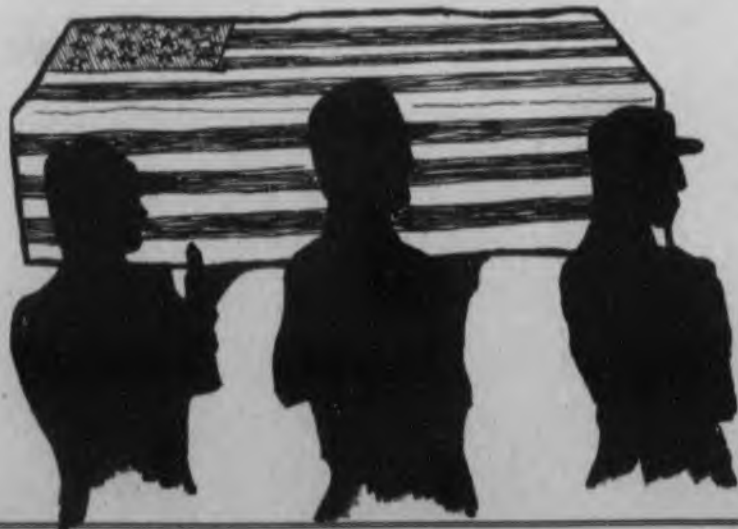

This is why torture will continue despite Washington's most apathetic efforts. Too much rests on the interrogator's shoulders for them to pay heed to the feel-gooders.

The reality is neither pretty nor desirable. But this is why General William Sherman opined "war is hell" and not "war is wonderful."

Vegetarians consider health, cost

By Lacey Mackey
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Sara Bennett said she has always loved animals, but after she watched her father take photographs of a group of baby calves a few years ago, she said she knew her life was about to change.

"I decided to become a vegetarian because I felt it wasn't necessary to take the life of something else into my body for me to survive," Bennett, freshman in open-option, said.

After making the decision 2 1/2 years ago, Bennett said she often was questioned and laughed at for her choice, especially by some of the boys at her high school.

"I couldn't go a week without someone asking me if I wanted some meat, just to be funny," Bennett said. "It makes me feel like they're ignorant, like they don't have moral reasoning in their lives."

Bennett said she never finds it hard to find something to eat and usually consumes a lot of soy in her diet.

"I never really liked meat that much," she said. "For sandwiches, I would always ask for the thinnest piece of meat."

While meat may be lacking from her diet, Bennett said energy certainly is not.

"I take vitamins every day. I think I'm personally a lot healthier than people who have meat," she said. "It makes me more alert, and I can even see things better."

Although some say being a vegetarian may empty out the pocketbook, Bennett said she can find what she needs almost everywhere without extra costs.

"It probably evens out in the end. It can definitely be less," Bennett said. "It's definitely not more expensive to be a vegetarian."

Audrey Clowers, assistant manager at People's Grocery, said, depending on the preference of the customer, prices can be relatively affordable for vegetarians.

"Personally, I think meat's more expensive," Clowers said. "It depends on how you want to get your source of protein. If someone is a vegan and eats only beans and grains, that's a lot less than meat."

Vegans differ from vegetarians because they do not ingest animal products or use products tested on animals. Vegetarians refrain from eating meat, with or without the consumption of dairy products.

People's Grocery offers a variety of fresh produce and tofu options to give people a choice.

"Vegans, to someone who doesn't eat meat all the time, can find something here," Clowers said.

When Diana Schalles, nutritionist at Lafene Health Center, helps vegetarians determine what their diet should include, she said she will ask them the items eaten in the last three days and educate them on what nutrients might be lacking from their diet.

For many vegetarian diets, Schalles said zinc, iron, calcium and vitamins B-12 and D often can be lacking.

Some food choices Schalles suggested include dried fruits and fortified breakfast cereals, nuts and soy products rich in calcium and protein.

According to the Vegetarian Resource Group, a varied diet is a must to obtain required nutrients. The group suggests

Catrina Rawson | COLLEGIAN

Sara Bennett, freshman in open-option, has been a vegetarian for two and a half years. She also takes vitamins to keep a healthy diet.

dark, leafy greens for increased calcium as well as dried beans for more iron.

Eliminating meat can often cause fatigue if people aren't careful, Schalles said, especially for women.

"Meat is one the first things women think to eliminate when dieting. If they're iron-deficient, they may be fatigued," she said.

Schalles said she recommends a generic multi-vitamin for vegetarians to ensure they are getting the appropriate nutrients in their diet.

Schalles said making unhealthy choices can happen easily for many vegetarians.

"It amazes me when they say they're vegetarian but getting very few fruits and vegetables," she said. "People need to increase their fruits and vegetables, and it can be a very healthy choice, but it doesn't have to be an extreme."

Donation to RCPD aids investigators

By Logan C. Adams
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The Riley County Police Department is using a digital tool that aided in the capture of Wichita's "Bind, Torture, Kill" serial killer.

EnCase Forensic Software, a software made by Pasadena, Calif.-based Guidance Software, is being used in the investigation of several cases at Riley County Police Department, Detective Brad Schlerf said.

Schlerf said the software is used to recover data deleted from digital devices and collect information from documents. He said the software was used by the Wichita Police Department to help find Dennis Rader, the man who dubbed himself BTK for "Bind, Torture, Kill."

A Guidance Software release said the Wichita Police Department and the Federal Bureau of Investigation used the software to find data on a floppy disk Rader had sent to a Kansas television station.

The software was featured in the CBS movie "The Hunt for the BTK Killer," which was broadcast in October. After the movie was completed, Guidance Software chose to donate the software to a Kansas law enforcement department.

According to the release RCPD Director Mike Watson was part of the Wichita Police Department for 24 years and was chief of police from 1995 to 2000. Wichita Police Department investigators and current Chief of Police Norman Williams nominated Watson and the RCPD to receive the software.

"Obviously, I was extremely pleased," Watson said. "One, that Guidance would give us the software, and two, the people I served with ... that they were aware we needed the software."

Schlerf said while working a case, he would remove a hard drive or other device that holds data and make an exact digital copy of it on a digitally-wiped hard drive. The original would then be placed back into storage, and the copy would be used to search for digital evidence.

To guarantee the copy is an exact replica, Schlerf said the software puts the whole drive through an algorithm that creates a long code that represents the sum of the data. If a single bit of data were to be different between the drives, it would change the resulting code and reveal the evidence had been tampered with.

In a demonstration of the software, Schlerf placed a few documents onto a floppy disk, changing some and deleting others, and put the disk in the computer that operates the EnCase Forensic software.

The computer loaded the information, and Schlerf said he was able to find information hidden in the files. For example, he was able to find the name of the computer that had saved a Microsoft Word file onto the disk.

The software was also able to find all the files that had been deleted from the disk. Schlerf said when files are deleted from a hard drive, they are removed from the computer's directory of files.

The data can be found by scanning the hard drive. Schlerf said this could help with cases involving the sexual exploitation of minors.

"If a computer is used to commit the crime, we can go back and find any evidence," he said.

Program helps students earn bachelor's degree

By Ashleigh Williams
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

K-State has taken the steps to allow students to earn a degree in four years from two different colleges with the new 2+2 program.

This program allows students to stay at their local community college and finish their associate's degree and then complete a distance-based bachelor's degree through K-State.

"The agreement makes our degree programs more easily accessible to students who otherwise couldn't do them," said Betty Stevens, associate vice provost in the division of Continuing Education.

The program is designed so students who want to complete a bachelor's degree through K-State are able to do so while working full-time or staying in their current location.

The 2+2 program assists community college students by giving them a curriculum to help plan their transfer to K-State. This allows students to take the classes that are guaranteed to transfer.

"The students would have had to do it anyway, but now we're doing the planning in advance," Stevens said. "It just makes it easier for students to plan for their bachelor's degree at K-State now that they can visualize what they need to do and when."

The 2+2 program has an additional benefit for the students.

"It saves students money and time," said Marilyn Rhinehart, vice president of instruction at Johnson County Community College. "The students know exactly what courses transfer to K-State, it helps keep them on course and makes for an easy, seamless transfer."

JCCC is one of the many community colleges involved with the 2+2 programs. There are agreements with Barton County, Colby, Hutchinson, and Seward County community colleges. There also are agreements with community colleges outside of Kansas.

"We will see many more of these agreements throughout the state and outside of the state," Stevens said. "All of the community colleges we have talked to have been very excited about the idea."

Recently, K-State made four 2+2 agreements with Independence Community College and K-State-Salina for the engineering technology bachelor's degree program.

"We are very excited to have this agreement become a reality," Dennis Kuhlman, K-State-Salina dean, said. "These new program advising guides will enable students to see exactly how they can be successful in completing their bachelor's degree at K-State-Salina. It is a tribute to the strength of the engineering technology programs at both ICC and K-State-Salina, and we hope it helps students enrich their educational experience even further."

Power shifts to the West in Kansas sports

It's been three days and I am still shocked at what I saw on Saturday.

MATTHEW GIRARD

I watched the K-State men's basketball team beat Kansas for the first time in 12 years. I know, it's crazy. I mean, who would have thought the Wildcats would go to Allen Fieldhouse in Lawrence and come away with a win.

KU fans can say what they will, but the bottom line is the Wildcats won and shifted the balance of power in Kansas collegiate sports to the West.

For as long as I've been paying attention to K-State and KU sports, there was a balance. K-State was the football school and KU was the basketball school.

Am I saying K-State should now be considered the basketball school in Kansas?

No.

Honestly, it's only one win in 31 tries, but Wildcat fans can at least entertain the idea after K-State's 59-55 win Saturday and Kansas' 89-86 overtime loss to Missouri on Monday.

Before the season began, I was fairly confident K-State could sneak a win against KU at Bramlage Coliseum.

Never did I think I would be typing the words "K-State has the possibility of sweeping Kansas in basketball" — a feat the Wildcats haven't done since the 1982-83 season.

Not only can fans now entertain the idea of bringing brooms to the March 4 re-match, they can also call Lawrence "Manhattan East" (at least until next year).

Maybe the win will propel K-State into the postseason, and Kansas will be forced to watch K-State play in the NCAA Tournament from home, which would be the ultimate revenge.

Go ahead, Jayhawk fans, make excuses and whine about Roy Williams leaving (because we all know you will use him as your scapegoat), but just remember — the streak is over.

Matthew Girard is a senior in print journalism. You can e-mail him at sports@pub.ksu.edu.

K-State's Akeem Wright goes for a steal against Kansas' Justin Wright during the second half Saturday. The Wildcat's defense helped K-State battle back from a 43-31 deficit with 13 minutes left in the second half.

Kansas' 31-game winning streak ends with K-State victory, 59-55

KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Something unbelievable happened Saturday afternoon, when K-State pulled off the upset, stunning the Kansas Jayhawks — and the nation — at Allen Fieldhouse in Lawrence for the first time in 12 years.

"I can't believe it. Can you guys?" Coach Jim Wooldridge said in shock following the game.

Jayhawk (10-5, 1-1) fans couldn't believe it, but Wildcat (10-4, 1-2) fans reveled in K-State's surprising win, surrounding the team and chanting "KSU" for nearly 20 minutes after the game.

"Everybody recognizes that they (Kansas) are one of the stellar programs in the Big 12 Conference," Wooldridge said. "To come over here and get this job done is a feather in our kids' cap. I am excited for them. It's a great feeling, a feeling that is diametrically opposite from what they were feeling Wednesday."

I know we've been under the microscope as a program — are we going this way or are we going that way? Today we took the right turn."

The storybook victory came in the nick of time for the Cats. It's no mystery that Wooldridge's coaching abilities have been in question recently, especially after K-State's performance in Wednesday's loss to Nebraska. The Wildcats' legitimacy in the Big 12 also was raising doubt, with zero conference wins and zero road victories before Saturday.

The fate of Saturday's game was put on the line, literally, when junior forward Akeem Wright was fouled and sent to the free-throw line with nine seconds left and a 58-55 K-State edge. He missed the first one, and Jayhawk coach Bill Self called a timeout to ice Wright. While everyone in Allen Fieldhouse was holding their breath, junior forward Cartier Martin

The K-State women turned their luck around Saturday after facing the possibility of a first three-game Big 12 Conference losing streak since the 2000-01 season, with a 85-66 win over the Colorado Buffaloes.

Sparked by the overall play of freshman Shalee Lehning and a career-high tying output of 22 points from junior Twigg McIntyre, the Wildcats (12-3, 2-2) dominated the Buffaloes (6-10, 1-3) to pick up their seventh-straight win against Colorado.

"Any time you can get a win in the Big 12, it's huge," Coach Deb Patterson said. "Coming off two road losses, we just felt like this was an opportunity that we really had to grab a hold of, and I'm really proud of our basketball team for doing just that."

For the first 10 minutes of the game, K-State and Colorado battled back and forth, and it appeared the outcome might come down to the last minute, but the Wildcats took the lead and control of the game with a 36-6 run in the

Lehning plays big role in Colorado win

Saturday began with a huge win — for the men's team.

The women's basketball team was looking for a win against Colorado just as badly after a disappointing two-game road stint, with losses to Missouri and Texas A&M.

A 3-pointer six seconds into the game by junior guard Twigg McIntyre got the crowd roaring, but it was the assist from freshman guard Shalee Lehning that set the pace for K-State.

"Lehning was just phenomenal," Coach Deb Patterson said. "Her aggressiveness, her willingness to play all phases of the game, her understanding of how competing hard every pass and every cut allows you to make plays. Whether it's a defensive board, whether it's a deflection, whether it's a steal, whether it's a rebound or an assist, she plays with the passion and intensity that elevates the game for those around her."

Although Lehning posted impressive numbers against the Buffaloes — including her 10 assists, eight rebounds, six points and six steals — she said the previous two road losses provided good learning experience for the team.

"It was a great experience for us to see the atmospheres we're going to play in are going to be tough, and we have to bring focus and attention to every possession," Lehning said. "That was something that I learned the most is that you can't take a break at all because Big 12 Conference teams are going to jump on you when you do, and they're going to get you down and you just got to keep a positive attitude and keep going."

Lehning already has established herself as a leader on her team and in the Big 12. She's pacing her team in assists with 63 total and is eighth in the Big 12 in assists, averaging 4.36 per game — the second-best among rookies in the league. She also is ranked 10th in the Big 12 with a 1.56 assist-to-turnover ratio. Not to mention her Big 12 Rookie of the Week recognition Dec. 12, which marks the first K-State freshman to earn the honors since 2001-02.

It's a competitive nature that's helped Lehning make an impressive name for herself early on, she said.

"When you're on the court, your adrenaline gets going. You don't really notice that you're tired and you want to compete every possession and you just want to do all that you can for the time you're on the floor," Lehning said.

TRK | Two Automatically Qualify for NCAA's

K-State track and field had a successful excursion to the Arkansas Invitational on Friday at the Randal Tyson Track Center in Fayetteville. The Wildcats saw two athletes register NCAA automatic-qualifying performances and a number of athletes finish among the top five.

Senior Kyle Lancaster regained the top spot among the Wildcats' male high jumpers by winning the high jump on Friday. Lancaster cleared a height of 7-03 3/4 to reach his fourth straight NCAA Indoor Championship in March. Lancaster has earned two straight NCAA Indoor All-America honors in the high jump.

Senior Breanna Eveland automatically qualified for the NCAA Indoor Championships in the women's pole vault. The Grand Rapids, Mich., product soared to a Kansas State record-tying height of 13-09 1/4. Eveland equaled the top height in the competition, but was placed behind event winner April Steiner of Adidas because of misses on the final clearance. Eveland has now soared above 13 feet in 11 straight meets.

Also for the men, senior Christian Smith provisionally qualified in the men's mile run. Smith crossed the tape in 4 minutes, 2.58 seconds for a second-place finish.

Also in the women's pole vault, senior Annika Haedt registered an NCAA provisional qualifying height of 12-11 1/2 for a fourth-place finish. Haedt rebounded from not registering a height during last weekend's KSU Invitational.

NFL | NFL says ref made wrong call in playoffs

The NFL said the referee made a mistake — the Pittsburgh Steelers' Troy Polamalu caught the ball.

The league acknowledged Monday that referee Pete Morelli erred when he overturned on replay Polamalu's interception of a pass by the Indianapolis Colts' quarterback, Peyton Manning, in Sunday's playoff game between Pittsburgh and Indianapolis.

Mike Pereira, the league's vice president of officiating, said in a statement that Morelli should have upheld the call, made with 5:26 left in Pittsburgh's win over the Colts.

NFL | Dungy call Colts season "a failure"

The usually stoic and optimistic Tony Dungy acknowledged the obvious Monday — the Colts' defeat on Sunday against the Steelers made it a lost season.

"You come in and the idea is that you want to make the playoffs and win the Super Bowl, and we didn't do that. So it is a failure," he said.

The Colts had an NFL-high seven players chosen to the Pro Bowl and four to the All-Pro team. Their defense, the weak link for Peyton Manning's first seven seasons, allowed an AFC-low 247 points and finally provided some balance to the high-scoring offense.

CBK | Kansas drops second straight in loss to Missouri

Thomas Gardner scored a career-high 40 points, including two free throws with 1:01 left in overtime that put Missouri ahead for good in a stunning 89-86 victory over Kansas.

The Tigers (10-5, 3-1 Big 12) trailed by seven points before outscoring Kansas 10-3 over the final 30 seconds of regulation.

Gardner's 3-pointer with 5.6 seconds left tied the game.

Kansas (10-6, 1-2) had a chance to win it when Christian Moody was fouled as he went up for a dunk with 0.4 seconds left in regulation, but he missed both free throws.

The lead changed hand 22 times, six times in overtime.

Musical chemistry

Faculty members use band as a creative outlet

KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The Web site of the Red State Blues Band proclaims them to be "The best damn blues band west of the Big Blue River." They played Jan. 13 at P.J.'s Bar for a packed crowd.

The Red State Blues Band is a seven-member ensemble composed of faculty members from K-State. They are not in the department of music, but instead they are divided among the Division of Biology and the departments of horticulture and plant pathology.

"The band is an outlet for our musical abilities," said Seth Galitzer, computer information specialist in the plant pathology department.

Galitzer is the lead vocalist and also plays saxophone.

The band first met at a party hosted by keyboarder Karen Garrett.

"Karen knew of a bunch of people throughout the department that played instruments," said Steve Travers, research associate in the plant pathology department and the band's drummer. "She invited everyone to her house for an informal jam session. We all had a blast."

The group had such excellent chemistry they decided to begin meeting and practicing regularly since March, Travers said.

They received guidance from guitarist Bernd Friebe, research professor in plant pathology, who led a traveling blues band in his hometown of Berlin, Germany.

"Bernd is really the center of everything," Travers said. "He has given us great guidance — he knows exactly how to lead a band."

Friebe, who said he rarely picked up his guitar since moving to Manhattan, said it is excellent to play just for fun. He said it didn't take him long to re-learn the guitar.

"It took me a couple of months to regain the calluses on my fingers (caused by bending the strings), but it (playing guitar) is something you never really forget," Friebe said.

Bassist Mike Herman, associate professor of biology; guitarist Pete Garfinkle, non-degree student in horticulture; and harmonica-player Walter Dodds, professor of biology, round out the band.

The members said they have a variety of musical influences including classic Delta blues, electric ("Chicago-style") blues and more rock-oriented blues like Eric Clapton.

"We like to say that we play everything from Albert King to ZZ Top and everything in between," Travers said.

Red State Blues Band's repertoire consists mostly of covers with a couple originals, Travers said.

Next, the band plans to begin work on a demo tape in a local studio and will continue playing gigs in the surrounding areas, Galitzer said.

The band's main focus is to have a good time while maintaining quality, Travers said.

"Everyone feels like if we can turn people in this area on to the blues it would be great — we would simply be thrilled," Travers said.

Relationship self-help book not just for women

"He's just not that into you"

Book review by Matt Peterworth

It's a good thing I knew the girl at Walden Books, otherwise I wouldn't have known where to find "He's Just Not That Into You" written by Greg Behrendt and Liz Tuccillo.

Upon arrival in the relationship self-help section, I was greeted by an unpleasant $21.95 price tag. Being a guy, I wasn't about to fork up that much for a book directed toward women. But still, it looked promising.

Luckily, I was staying with a friend over the winter break who had the book.

I borrowed it and took it around town with me for the day — hiding it inside a newspaper because the cover is pink, and I didn't want to be seen with a girlie book. But eventually, I had to get it out to read it.

I was in the first chapter, and the guy behind the counter at the store I was sitting in said it was a good book and really funny. "What are you talking about?" I asked myself. Then the girl next to him said, "Yeah, Oprah even talked about it."

I'm reading an Oprah book? Oh my God, I've just hit a new low.

But I forged on, determined to see what secrets this guy was telling perspective girls in my dating pool. I can only assume girls I want to date have read this book — or at least had a friend tell them about this book — because it was a New York Times No. 1 best-seller.

To begin with, it's written by two people, both associated with "Sex and the City." Okay, maybe I'll concede actual credibility here.

The book is set up as a series of excuses.

Women would write in with their current relationship situation, and then Behrendt would concisely explain why the guy is just not into her. Tuccillo would follow up with her commentary.

But how are women going to learn from another woman, who's been in the same situations, looking at them the same way?

The point of this book is to get the guy's perspective on things, and in this sense, Greg does a great job.

His straight-forward, "You're too good for him," "Don't take any crap from anyone" approach to finding the right guy is brilliant in its simplicity and is causing women everywhere to get out of dead-end relationships.

But where he differentiates himself from Dr. Phil and telling it like it is, is that his advice is funny, too. I could quote a witty quip, but you'll just have to read this book yourself to find out how truly entertaining it is.

And if I'm not over-inflating this book enough, not just women should read this book, but especially men as well.

I thought I was a nice guy. Much to my chagrin, as this book has clearly pointed out, in my last few relationships I have been a jerk. I let some really great girls get away.

I even bought my own excuses, thinking I was just not that into her.

Reading this book opened my eyes to my stupid ways.

Guys everywhere need to read this book to know how to get with, and stay with, a great woman, because women everywhere are reading this book and following its advice.

Professor urges system change

By Yiyi Chen
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The lobbyist and political advocacy system is up for changes, said Diane Swanson, von Waaden business administration professor in the College of Business Administration.

"The average citizen does not have the same kind of access to public policymakers as those who put up vast sums of money to press for their vested interests to be given priority," Swanson said.

Swanson said politicians shouldn't be solely financed by affluent lobbyists. The public should also have the constancy from their representatives.

"I think that we should go public with the financing of a campaign, so that our representatives don't owe their allegiance to certain groups that gave them a lot of campaign money, but rather owe allegiance to average citizens," she said.

Swanson said she was cynical about the blueprint for future political reforms because of the political puppet shows.

"Right now, big money dominates politics, and that distorts public policy decision. I'm pessimistic about these reforms. The very people donating the big money control the people in Congress," she said.

In the wake of the Jack Abramoff bribery case, Swanson said the policymakers might as well do something for now, but in the long run it might still be business as usual.

"Some people at Washington are shamed enough because of the media attention, and they may investigate the scandal. In the long run, I'm still skeptical that politics will maintain the status quo," she said.

Swanson urged average citizens to take actions to have their voices heard.

"The average citizen should write to their congressmen to push for reforms," she said.

Swanson's skepticism is echoed among the fellow students at K-State.

Mike Netherton, senior in political science, said he didn't expect the system to be faultless.

"Without infringing the freedom of speech, I don't see how the system could be fixed quickly," Netherton said. "Lobbyists are always there with politicians. It's the individual responsibility for the politicians to serve the people. These wrong politicians and lobbyists screwed up the system."

Sen. Roger Reitz, a R-Kan. said that Capitol Hill had gotten financial things out of the shelter and fell short of the ethical standard at the local level.

"I serve the best interests of Kansas and was only approached by lobbyists when the Jan. 2 legislature was over," Reitz said. "They only give me as much information as they can. I let them (lobbyists) know that basically it is still my call."

Bakery Science program considers expansion

By Jonas Hogg
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Ever wonder who keeps the doughnut industry fresh and innovative?

Odds are it's a K-State graduate.

K-State offers an undergraduate degree in bakery science, a program rooted in the grain science and industry department.

The four-year program offers a bachelor of science degree. Students can choose from either a production management option, or a chemistry option, according to a K-State news release.

Jian Li, research assistant in the Department of Grain Science and Industry, said the program is looking at expanding and offering more options than the current two, but the emphasis of the program will stay the same.

"Our main focus is product development and insuring quality control," Li said.

The program is one of the few like it in the world, with the majority of its competition coming from Europe, Li said. Domestically, K-State has an academic monopoly, as the K-State undergraduate program is the only one of its kind in North America, Li said.

Jon Faubion, professor of grain science and industry, said the program is a door-opener.

"It's a way to get into an entire segment of the food industry that deals with cereal-based foods," he said.

Once students graduate, they are marketable for many fields, from production and research to technical sales, he said.

Faubion stressed the opportunities that are available for graduates of the program.

"It's a seller's market right now, so people get job offers and they get good job offers."

This sentiment was echoed by recently retired grain science and industry professor Chuck Walker.

"We know we have a good program because our students are in high demand. Last year they were running at around $50,000 starting," he said.

Walker, who was a member of the grain science and industry faculty for 18 years, emphasized the scientific nature of the program.

"Most of the work that we do is an applied science," he said. "They have to learn hands-on baking so they understand, but most will not be hands-on bakers when they finish."

The bakery science program works with the American Institute of Baking, also located in Manhattan.

Although the AIB is not officially related to the university, the two have worked closely in the past.

Department head and professor in the grain science and industry department, Virgil Smail, was president and chief executive officer of the AIB for almost 10 years.

K-State and the AIB are looking at collaborating for an associate's degree program. The program would meld AIB courses with courses from the bakery science program.

MEN'S | Second half spark takes Wildcats to win said the Cats weren't nervous.

"We just told him to focus, man," said Martin, who tallied 14 points against Kansas. "Stay focused and go out there and don't feel any pressure. Shoot a regular shot, and it will fall."

Wright sealed the victory when he sunk the second free throw, an action out of character for Wright, who was 1-of-5 from the line Saturday.

The Hawks had one more chance to score but couldn't connect, and when sophomore guard Clint Stewart (who tied his career-high 15 points against the Jayhawks) grabbed the rebound, the game and streak were over.

"It was all about the heart. We were just going over ourselves, trying to find ourselves, rather than going over what they (Kansas) were doing. We learned from that (Nebraska) loss and moved on today and came up with a great win."

The second half showcased a Wildcat squad, who, when playing to its potential and with passion, proved they can stop the formerly unstoppable.

pable. The first half, on the other hand, was shaping up to end like the K-State-Nebraska game.

The Wildcats put up a new season-low 18 first-half points with 30.4 percent field-goal shooting, committed 15 turnovers and went through an all-too-familiar six minute scoring drought at the 12:40 mark, allowing Kansas to stretch its lead to 22-10. It seemed K-State had trouble determining how to silence Jayhawk freshman Mario Chalmers, who led Kansas with 11 first-half points.

During halftime, something happened.

"He (Wooldridge) was furious," said senior reserve Schyler Thomas, who played a big part in the win with five crucial second-half points. "He looked at the stat sheet, said '15 turnovers?' and threw it in the trash."

It must have done the trick because the Cats came out with a competitive spark and looked like, well, a team.

K-State instantly switched to a 2-3 zone, forcing a run-and-gun Kansas team to shoot the outside shot, which didn't bode well for the Hawks, as they were 5-for-20 behind the arc on the game.

The well-executed zone, coupled with an explosive performance from Stewart, Thomas and senior Dramane Diarra -- who combined for 25 of K-State's 41 second-half points -- enabled the Cats to battle back from a 12-point obstacle in the second half. The threesome's offensive output was much-needed, as K-State's go-to man Martin (14 points) grabbed his fourth foul and was sent to the bench with 14 minutes to go.

With 6:32 left in regulation, the Hawks went ahead 47-44 off of Russell Robinson's free throws, which was the first time Kansas had scored in five minutes. From there, back-to-back Diarra jumpers and a Martin bucket gave K-State the 48-47 lead, which it never relinquished. Five minutes later, and scoring efforts from Stewart, Thomas, Diarra, Martin and Wright, the game was over and the celebration began.

"It was crazy in the locker room," said Diarra, who finished with eight critical points. "People were jumping up and down, screaming, yelling and crying. But not me, I'm tough."

final 10 minutes of the first half.

In the first half, McIntyre paced the Wildcats with 15 of her game-high 22 points on 6-of-8 shooting from the floor, including a perfect 3-for-3 from the three-point line.

"We had good execution on the offensive end, and shots were open for me," McIntyre said. "I'm just glad I was able to knock them down."

Despite only tallying two points in the first half, Lehning was the spark on offense and defense with seven assists and five steals.

"I think each of us knows the role we need to play, whether that's making a basket or making a pass or getting a big rebound," said Lehning, who finished with six points, eight rebounds, 10 assists and six steals. "Tonight (Saturday), each one of us came and pulled our own load, and when we all do that, we are pretty tough to stop."

After shooting a blistering 68.6 percent from the floor as a team in the first half, the Wildcats cooled off, shooting just 30.3 percent in the second half. The low shooting percentage aside, K-State was able to keep Colorado at a distance by holding Colorado's leading scorer, Jackie McFarland -- who is K-State senior Jessica McFarland's sister -- to just seven points in the second half. K-State also held Colorado to just 1-of-6 from the three-point line in the second half.

Fans swarm to Aggieville after Saturday's victory

By Kaley Lyon
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

After K-State's 59-55 victory over in-state rival Kansas in Saturday's basketball game, Aggieville came to life.

Thousands of K-State fans rushed to the 'Ville, eager to celebrate the occasion.

Jason Cooper, senior in architecture, had been watching the game at a friend's apartment. When the game ended with the Wildcats winning, the celebrating started immediately, he said.

"It was just amazing. I couldn't believe it," Cooper said. "We went outside and immediately there were people outside screaming and honking — and that's when we decided we'd better make a trip down to Aggieville."

While the celebrations in Aggieville lasted all night, Cooper said he thought it was even more packed in the afternoon, immediately after the game, than it was later that night.

He and his friends started off their celebration at O'Malley's Alley, 1210 Moro St., and also made stops at Rusty's Last Chance and Outback, 1209 Moro St., and the Purple Pig, 1119 Moro St.

In the afternoon, Cooper said Rusty's was chaotic.

People squeezed into the outside lot, standing shoulder to shoulder. Some people were standing on tables and others were even sitting on the roof, he said.

Jamie Williams, sophomore in women's studies and a waitress at O'Malley's, said she knew things would get crazy Saturday night as soon as she heard of the victory.

"It was insane. I have never seen anything like it," she said. "The best thing about it is it was so unexpected."

Saturday's game was the first time K-State defeated KU in basketball since 1994, which had made KU's active winning streak over K-State the fourth-longest in NCAA history.

The excited sports spectators all wore purple, some even chanting "K-State" and singing the fight song, Williams said.

"It was just like, even if you didn't know anybody it felt really united," she said. "Even if you're not a basketball fan, it was just a big win, and everybody was friends with everybody."

The crowd also had a positive effect on the amount of sales O'Malley's made Saturday night. They sold more pizza than usual, and even had a special on shooters in honor of the victory, Williams said.

Chris Heil, junior in sociology, went to the 'Ville after watching the win on television.

"After we watched the game against Nebraska, the morale was down a little bit, but after we won everyone was just really excited about it," he said.

crowd, I feel like the better it is to play, because there's more energy in the building."

Thomas was not the only senior who came through for the Wildcats.

Diarra, the only other non-walk-on senior on the Cats' roster, stepped up his offensive production significantly in the second half.

When leading-scorer, junior forward Cartier Martin, was sidelined with his fourth foul just six minutes into the half, it was questionable where K-State would turn to pick up the scoring slack.

That was when Diarra responded, draining shot after shot from the 15 to 18-foot range on his way to eight points on 4-of-8 shooting.

Diarra said he was sure Kansas did not include his outside jumper in its scouting report on the Cats.

"They don't know that," he said. "I don't shoot that much. I work on it, and I shoot. I work on it every day."

Sophomore point guard Clint Stewart, another unlikely star who led the team in scoring with 15 points, said he was glad to see Diarra finally have the confidence to take the outside shot.

"Dramane can shoot," Stewart said. "Sometimes he doesn't take that shot, he tries to move the ball and stuff. For a big man, he's a great shooter. It was definitely big for him to knock down key shots and pull those big men out."

It was different to see production out of a variety of K-State players, but Coach Jim Wooldridge said that was his main focus after Wednesday's "embarrassment" against Nebraska.

"That was the theme going into this game," he said.

"We played so disjointed in the Nebraska game. To come back here and play better together and have the offense generated by teamwork is something I hope that we can continue to work on and improve on."

LOANS | University loan cuts likely in near future

Financial aid because they need it and making it more expensive will not help matters."

Alternative options other than loans are available for students if they are unable to afford school. Moeder said a private education and scholarships are among many options.

"Scholarships give students more control and are generally based on merit instead of need," he said. "I would advise students to become very aggressive in their search for scholarships."

Martha Holler, spokeswoman for Sallie Mae, a top student-loan lender, said the Senate has passed the bill, the House is expected to pass it, and the president has intended to sign it into a law.

"We will adjust to the changes in the law and will continue to provide industry leading products and services," she said.

Holler said cuts are made to lenders and special interests and aren't to students.

The $40 billion cuts one-third of the student loan program. The cuts will allow more student and family provisions. Limits will increase and students will be able to borrow more money as opposed to looking to other sources. The cuts will extend PLUS loans to graduate students, phase out origination fees, expand loan forgiveness to teachers and fixes the student loan interest rate to 6.8 percent.

This rate will apply to loans issued on or after July 1.

Based on the estimated rise when rates reset, the estimation comes close to the fixed rate. The total value of saving over the next five years is still unclear.

RaeAnna Seaton, senior in family studies and human services, said she wants to know what the money will be used for. If it is used for a good purpose, she said she sees it as an advantage.

"For some students, loans are the only way that they can attend college," she said. "We need education to survive in our society."

Center, a Boy Scout was finishing up his project for his Eagle Scout Badge with the help of other volunteers for the day of service.

Kevin Coffey, freshman at Manhattan High School, has been working on 30 shelves for the center's 11 classrooms since September 2005. He and other volunteers plugged holes in the shelves and sanded and stained them.

"Let me tell you, the teachers are very excited," said Debora Ring, director of the K-State Child Development Center.

About 30 other morning volunteers painted classroom walls and assembled cribs, tables and toys, Ring said.

Manhattan residents David and Tamara Robinson assembled a shelving unit in the center's new infant room while their two children played in the room. Tamara said the couple decided the volunteer opportunity would be a good way to spend time together while exposing their children early to volunteering.

Kristin Relyea put together one of six new cribs for the infant room.

Relyea, Manhattan resident, said she recently moved to Manhattan and was glad to find out about a volunteer opportunity.

"I think it's a privilege," she said. "I was just amazed to hear that this stuff doesn't get done if there aren't volunteers."

Ring said the center is completely funded by parent fees, and since 70 percent of the parents are K-State students, volunteer labor is necessary to keep fees affordable for students.

in college councils," he said. "You're able to be available to represent the student's concerns to the local, state and national government."

Student body president Michael Burns said candidates must attend one of the two mandatory meetings Feb. 20 and Feb. 21.

Topics discussed at the meeting will include deadlines, how to fill out expense reports, campaign signs and sidewalk chalking.

Candidates also will draw for their positions on the ballot at the mandatory meetings, he said.

Burns said serving on Student Governing Association is an opportunity for students to meet every week and discuss topics that affect students, such as student fees and academic policies.

K-State prohibits campaign logo use

By Adrienne DeWeese
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The use of K-State logos will not be allowed in the upcoming Student Governing Association elections March 7 and 8.

All K-State copyrighted or trademarked logos (e.g. K-State, the Powercat, Willie the Wildcat) are not licensed for use in conjunction with any political campaign, including any campaign for any office governed by these regulations. The university and its administrators do not endorse any candidates at any level, and if a candidate were to use a K-State logo, the use could give the impression of administrative support, said Tami Breymer, associate director of licensing for Institutional Advancement.

Court rules on right to die case

On Tuesday the U.S. Supreme Court upheld Oregon's Death with Dignity Act, which allows doctors to prescribe lethal doses of medicine to terminally ill patients.

The law was first challenged in 2001 by then - Attorney General, John Ashcroft and has been a hot-button in the sensitive assisted-suicide debate.

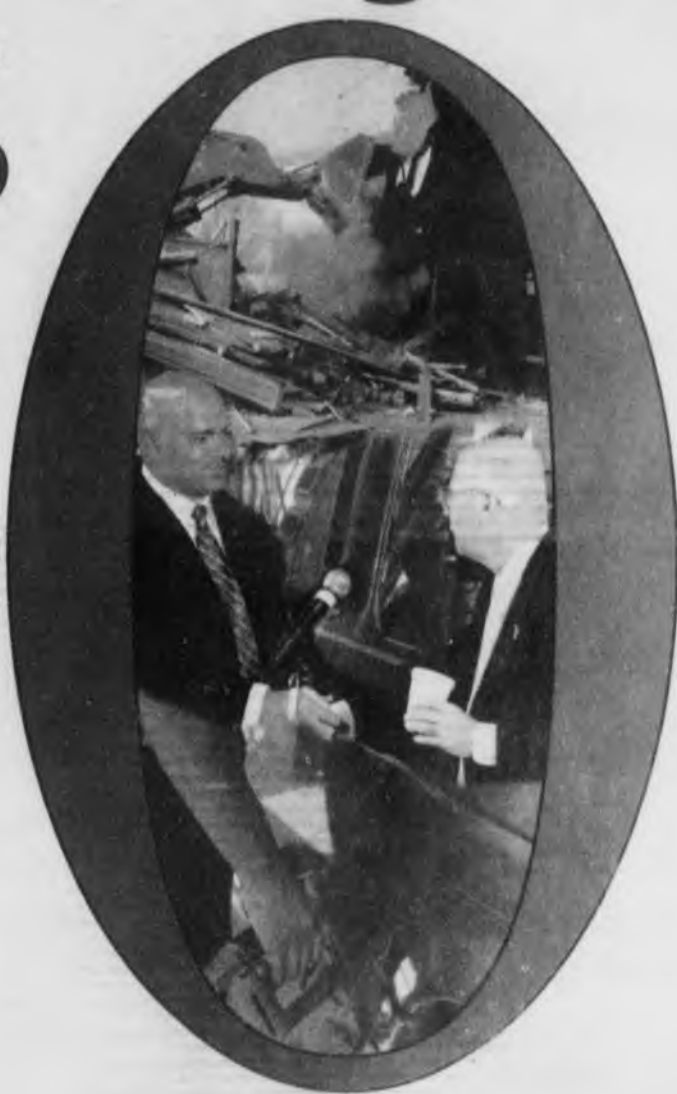

The ruling is one of the first landmark decisions over which newly appointed Chief Justice John Roberts has presided.

Roberts, along with justices Antonin Scalia and Clarence Thomas, provided the dissenting opinion.

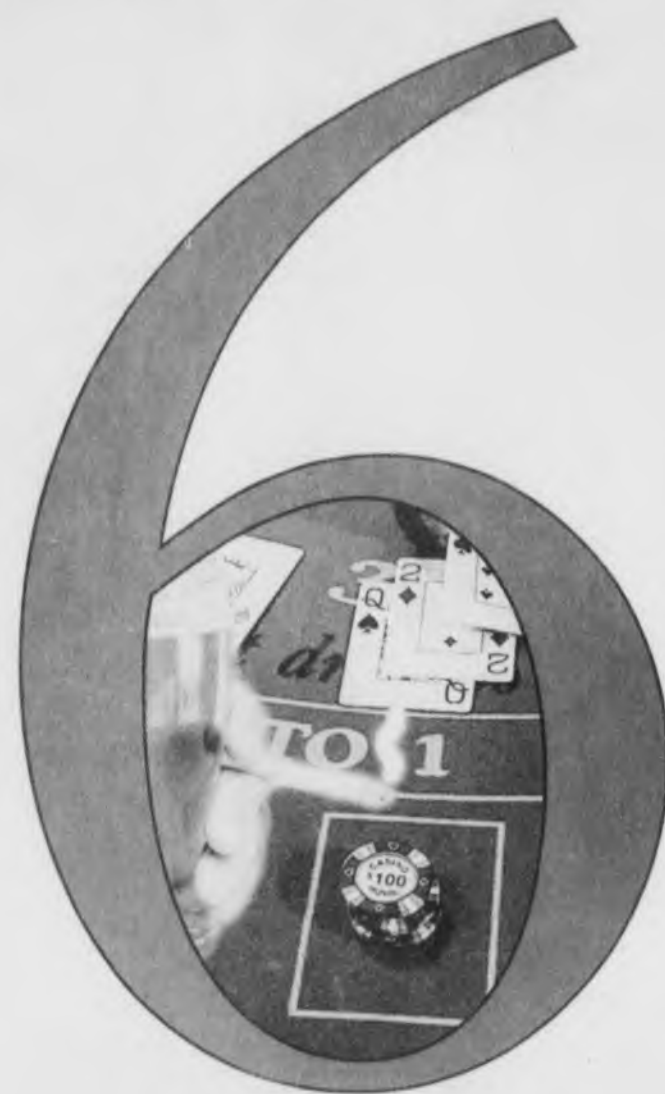

Scalia wrote "if the term 'legitimate medical purpose' has any meaning, it surely excludes the prescription of drugs to produce death."

Things to know in

By Annette Lawless
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

From banning smoking in local restaurants to legalizing state gambling, 2006 has several hot-button issues hitting up K-State, the Manhattan area and the state of Kansas. No matter the issue, people are likely to butt heads over these topics.

RON PRINCE Bringing in a new coach

Following in the footsteps of one who some consider a legend, Ron Prince will get to put his passion on the playing field as the new K-State football coach this fall.

Prince is the successor to former K-State football coach Bill Snyder, who served as football coach for 17 years and led the Wildcats to 136 wins.

When Prince was introduced as coach, Athletics Director Tim Weiser said he wanted to find the best person to lead K-State's team, which some consider especially important, as the football team is coming off of its second consecutive losing season.

"What we wanted to do was, first and foremost, try and find somebody that was going to be a good fit," Weiser said in a press conference.

"I think the one thing that we knew was that our search had to have enough flexibility and enough response to the situation, so that as candidates came into focus, we could allow ourselves to consider those people. Simply put, we want to win championships."

Prince grew up in Junction City and said he had been preparing for the position most of his life, but he said he didn't expect to get here so soon.

"It's the mission of this organization to become a fast, strong, tough and disciplined team that consistently competes for championships," Prince said at a press conference last month. "We are committed to the total development of our people, not just on the field, but off. We represent K-State as ambassadors of the game, and we fully recognize and acknowledge our role on the front porch of this university and this community."

"Our charge is to reinforce the traditions, the excitement and the electricity created by Coach Snyder at Kansas State."

SMOKING Local ban in restaurants

Representatives of Clean Air Manhattan presented the smoking ban information to Manhattan City Commissioners in November, aiming to get the group to vote on a policy to affect Manhattan restaurants this year. Other organizations, including Tobacco Free Kansas Coalition also have supported the campaign through various letters submitted to the city.

"The science is now indisputable - tobacco smoke pollution can injure and even kill people who are exposed to it," said John Hauxwell, president of the Tobacco Free Kansas Coalition. "Breathing this toxic mixture of irritants and carcinogens can cause irreversible injury with as little as 30 minutes exposure. (This) is the third leading cause of death in America."

This month, Mercy Regional Health Center practitioners have started enforcing a workplace smoking ban at the Lafene Health Center and Mercy Regional Health Center locations.

According to the American Nonsmokers' Rights Foundation, this will add Mercy Regional Health Center to the 300 total workplaces that completely ban smoking in the United States. Nearly 70 percent of the U.S. workforce has functioned under a smoke-free policy.

LOCAL HOUSING Housing transitions

For some, finding a home in the next few years might become more difficult, but local housing officials are undergoing major transitions to cater to the area population influx, as well as staying ahead of housing trends.

By 2007, more than 22,000 people will move to the Fort Riley area, Lt. Gov. John Moore said at a press conference last fall. That number is nearly half of

Vigil marks MLK Day activities

About 200 marchers made their way through the K-State campus Tuesday evening, softly singing the chorus to "We Shall Overcome" as they completed their march of quiet protest of racism.

While this resembles a scene straight out of the civil rights movement that swept the nation during the '60s, K-State students of all races and ethnicities united last night in re-enacting this event.

"I came here because Dr. Martin Luther King did a lot for us as a community," said Britt Mills, junior in management information systems. "It's important to represent the Civil Rights march from Birmingham so the whole campus can see that we haven't let down the civil rights movement."

The students who participated in the Dr. Martin Luther King Jr.

Memorial Walk and Candlelight Vigil actually were standing on ground that King himself walked upon, said Don Fallon, coordinator of religious activities.

Fallon dined with King in the Bluemont Room at the K-State Student Union during his visit to K-State in January 1968.

A waste of time — but hey, it's better than lecture

Stupid criminals

Not the most logical ways of committing crimes

Robbed by a smurf

A 19-year-old man was arrested and charged with robbery and assault by Anchorage, Ala., police after he held up a Super 8 Motel. He was disguised as a smurf. The man threatened the bank clerk with a knife and demanded money. The man left the scene and was apprehended with blue Bingo ink on his ears, nose, throat and fingertips.

Cold onion rings? Don't call 911

A 30-year-old woman allegedly dialed 911 to complain to police about her cold onion rings in Houma, La. She told the operator that the waiter had refused to replace them. The police showed up but arrested her for wasting police resources.

Roman Candles and gasoline

A man attempted to rob a bank near St. Louis with a pint-sized container of gasoline and a roman candle. He demanded the teller fill up a bag with cash and then took a woman hostage. When she escaped, he tried to get into his rental car but was arrested and charged with first-degree robbery and armed criminal action.

Modern-day "Dumb and Dumber"

Two Australian men robbed a bank in Vail, Colo., and then took photographs with the money they had stolen. They used two unloaded 88 guns to pull off the heist, but were wearing their work badges from the ski resort where they were employed. They also attempted to get away by boarding a chair lift with their Vail ski passes. The two men were caught and sentenced to five years each in prison. The Australian press dubbed the two men as "Dumb and Dumber."

Stealing gas is a tiring crime

A Muncie, Ind., man was arrested for siphoning gas into a 55-gallon drum. The drum had been installed into the back of his van. Unfortunately for him, he fell asleep and police arrested him on charges of theft and possession of a firearm without a permit. It was estimated the drum would have held about $150 worth of fuel.

Diesel delinquents

Two men in Indiana were arrested on felony charges after they tried to steal gasoline from a construction company. The men put off-road-grade diesel fuel in the tank of their car. They were spotted by an employee and tried to make a getaway, but the car wouldn't start.

Doggy want a biscuit?

Indiana State Police said a man stopped for speeding was trying to distract the drug-sniffing dog. When the dog began walking around Jong Kim's car, he threw dog biscuits and debris out the window. However, the dog was not distracted, and Kim was charged with felony possession of marijuana and for resisting officers.

Hit the (stolen) jackpot

A 38-year-old Oregon woman faced numerous theft-related charges, forgery and possession of methamphetamines after she won the state lottery. The charges came after it was alleged she bought the winning ticket with a stolen credit card. Authorities said the card belonged to a deceased relative. The woman collected the first installment of $33,500, but it is unknown whether she will be able to collect the rest of her money.

Airport might add flights

By Logan C. Adams
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The Manhattan City Commission voted Tuesday to ask the Department of Transportation to increase the number of flights out of Manhattan Regional Airport.

Air service to Kansas City International Airport from Manhattan and Salina has been subsidized for the past two years by the DOT through the Essential Air Service program for $721,000 per year. Air Midwest, Inc., a subsidiary of Mesa Air Group, currently operates the daily flights through US Airways.

There are three round-trip flights between Salina, Manhattan and Kansas City, Mo., each weekday, one on Saturday and two on Sunday with the current program.

The contract lasts for two years and is then opened up for proposals from other companies. The new contract takes effect March 1.

Two new companies, Multi-Aero, Inc. and Regions Air, Inc. submitted proposals to the DOT to operate service from Manhattan.

Diane Stoddard, deputy city manager, said Regions' proposal asked for too much money and Multi-Aero could not meet the criteria for plane size under the program.

"We have only one bid that's acceptable," Mayor Ed Klimek said.

This left the current operator, Air Midwest, which gave the DOT four proposals.

The first proposal would keep the current schedule the same, and the second would add a round-trip flight on Mondays, Wednesdays and Fridays.

The third proposal would have flights between Manhattan and Kansas City, Mo., with the same frequency as there is now. The final proposal is for Salina-only service with two non-stop flights to Kansas City, Mo., each weekday and one each for Saturday and Sunday.

The commission agreed to have Klimek send a letter to the DOT asking for four flights per weekday as well as separate service from Salina.

The commission also approved the purchase of the Holiday Inn and Holidome, 530 Richards Drive, by Hulsing Hotels, LLC. There were industrial revenue bonds on the hotel, and the commission had to release them for the sale to be final.

Carnival allows students to get involved on campus

By Megan Molitor
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Students with a desire to be more involved took advantage of the Spring Activities Carnival on Tuesday night.

The event, which showcases student organizations, included new attractions this year, said Ben Hopper, Union Program Council adviser and one of the organizers of the carnival.

"This year's carnival is quite larger than previous years, and we were able to have photo key chains and live music," Hopper said.

With more than 115 organizations sharing the Union floor, many groups' members said they were pleased to have the chance to attract new members.

"I like to have it in the spring, because it seems to attract more people, which gives us a chance to see the public," said Charlene Anspaugh, branch manager of the KSU Karate Club.

Kirk Preston, KSU Juggling Club member and junior in biological and agricultural engineering, said this was the third or fourth year the club had attended the carnival.

In addition to campus organizations, many non-K-State groups promote internships and opportunities for students at the carnival. The Walt Disney World College Program Alumni Association's mission is to recruit students for internships in Orlando, Fla.

"We saw quite a few people out tonight, and got many to sign up and get information," Paul Davis, campus representative, said.

However, Davis had one suggestion: "I wish they would put it back in the ballroom," he said. "We seemed to have much more space up there."

Faculty Senate votes to increase maximum enrollment limits for fall

By Lola Shrimplin
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The Faculty Senate voted to increase the enrollment cap from 18 to 21 credit hours for the fall 2006 semester at Tuesday's meeting.

The proposed change to the University Handbook will read "an undergraduate student may not enroll for more than 21 Kansas State University credit hours in a semester unless the student is granted permission to do so by the student's academic dean or the dean's representative."

"It's by no means an agreed upon limit for the entire university," said Jacqueline Spears, associate professor of secondary education.

Both the College of Veterinary Medicine and the College of Architecture, Planning and Design require students to take more than 21 hours for certain semesters.

Other concerns addressed were whether students would know if they actually were enrolled in the class they were wait-listed for before the first day of class, and students' ability to enroll in 21 hours without seeking approval or assistance.

"We're probably apt to think it's a bad idea for students to enroll in more than 18 hours without talking to someone along the way," James Hohenbary III, Arts and Sciences adviser, said.

In other business, proposed changes to Graduation Scholastic Honors were approved.

Students with a 3.850-3.949 grade point average are now designated as Magna Cum Laude, while students with a 3.750-3.849 K-State academic average are designated as Cum Laude.

The previous policy stated that students in the upper three percent of their college graduating class were designated Magna Cum Laude, while those remaining in the upper 10 percent were designated Cum Laude.

TO THE POINT Be on lookout for hot-button election issues

With the gubernatorial election approaching this year, there are big things happening in the news that voters should look for when educating themselves about the candidates.

Some of the hot topics will include local smoking bans, gas prices and state-approved commercialized casinos.

If voters can keep up to date on current events, they will have the knowledge they need to make informed and educated choices when marking their ballots on voting day.

Those who choose not to be informed about the issues are missing out. By scrutinizing what elected officials are saying about issues that matter to them, voters can feel as if their candidate will make a difference.

Stay informed voters. After all, we live in a democracy and we all count on others to make the best decision when it's time for election day. So, keep your eyes and ears open for the hot news topic this semester. Pick up a newspaper, turn on the TV news, surf news Web sites and listen to news radio.

To the point is an editorial selected and debated by the editorial board and written after a majority opinion is formed. This is the Collegian's official opinion.

Supreme importance

Alito will uphold Constitution, democracy

"Look, daddy," professor says, "Every time the ballot machine ka-chings, a democracy gets its wings."

Unbeknownst to the little American undergrad, she doesn't even live in a democracy.

Actually, she and 290 million Americans live under a judicial oligarchy with tyrannical tendencies. Composed of nine unelected lawyers, the Supreme Court thwarts the democratic process with appalling frequency.

At their whim, five of these arbitrary arbiters can impose their will by judicial edict on virtually any issue. When unelected, unaccountable judges legislate from the bench, they have effectively become mentally disordered judicial activists.

The mental disorder of judicial activism borders on treason. This piss-ant practice of judicial fiat on oft-contentious political issues is repugnant to the Constitution and our Founders' intent.

The chief symptom of the mental disorder of liberal judicial activism is schizophrenia. Namely, liberal judicial activism births unintelligible, contradictory and ultimately schizophrenic Supreme Court decisions.

Consider this schizo. The Court holds that the Constitution protects flag burning and virtual online child pornography. Yet, this same Constitution somehow does not protect peaceful dispersal of pro-life leaflets at abortion clinics or student-led prayer at football games.

Of course, the American Left praises such asinine law.

However, the Left has failed to convince the electorate of their policies' merit. Indeed, hard Lefty policy doesn't win at the ballot box.

Many Americans don't support abortion on demand, expulsion of God from the public square, gay marriage, reverse racism quotas, illegal immigrant welfare or lawyers for al-Qaeda terrorists.

Ergo, the Left depends upon the activist courts to circumvent the people and sanity to impose this narrow agenda on America. But, their secret is out.

Restoration of the Constitution and return of contentious political issues to the people is simple — replace judicial activists with non-activist or "restrained" justices will strictly interpret the law, not create law.

Hence, we come to the retirement of judicial activist and darling of the feminazi NARAL-nags — Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, who ballyhooed that partial-birth abortions are a constitutional right. Good thing, too.

Who could imagine an America where it was illegal to dilate a pregnant woman's cervix, pull the fetus halfway out of the uterus by its feet, stab the baby's in-utero skull with scissors and suck out its brains vacuum style before fully extracting the lifeless body?

That would be unjust.

With the nomination of Judge Samuel Alito, Leftists are ringing their hands in dread of this paradigmatic moment in history to place a non-activist on the Court. Another non-activist justice is a direct threat to this abject agenda.

Thus, hard-left-liberal Democrat Senators like Teddy Kennedy have mounted a desperate dubious diatribe against Judge Alito.

Haven't had time to watch the confirmation hearings? Thankfully for you, I'm a free-lance satirical stenographer. Here's a free excerpt:

Sen. Kennedy: Judge Uhliotto, we can't roll back the 50 yee-uz of progress against discrimination on the basis of race and jinduh. Jinduh, that sounds a lot like gin. Mmmm, gin.

Judge Alito: I'm sorry Senator, was that a question?

Sen. Kennedy: Well, what I'm trying—[hiccup]—to say is that Bush hates all women and black people in New Orleans. And he nominated you, didn't he?

Judge Alito: Well, yes Senator — he did nominate me.

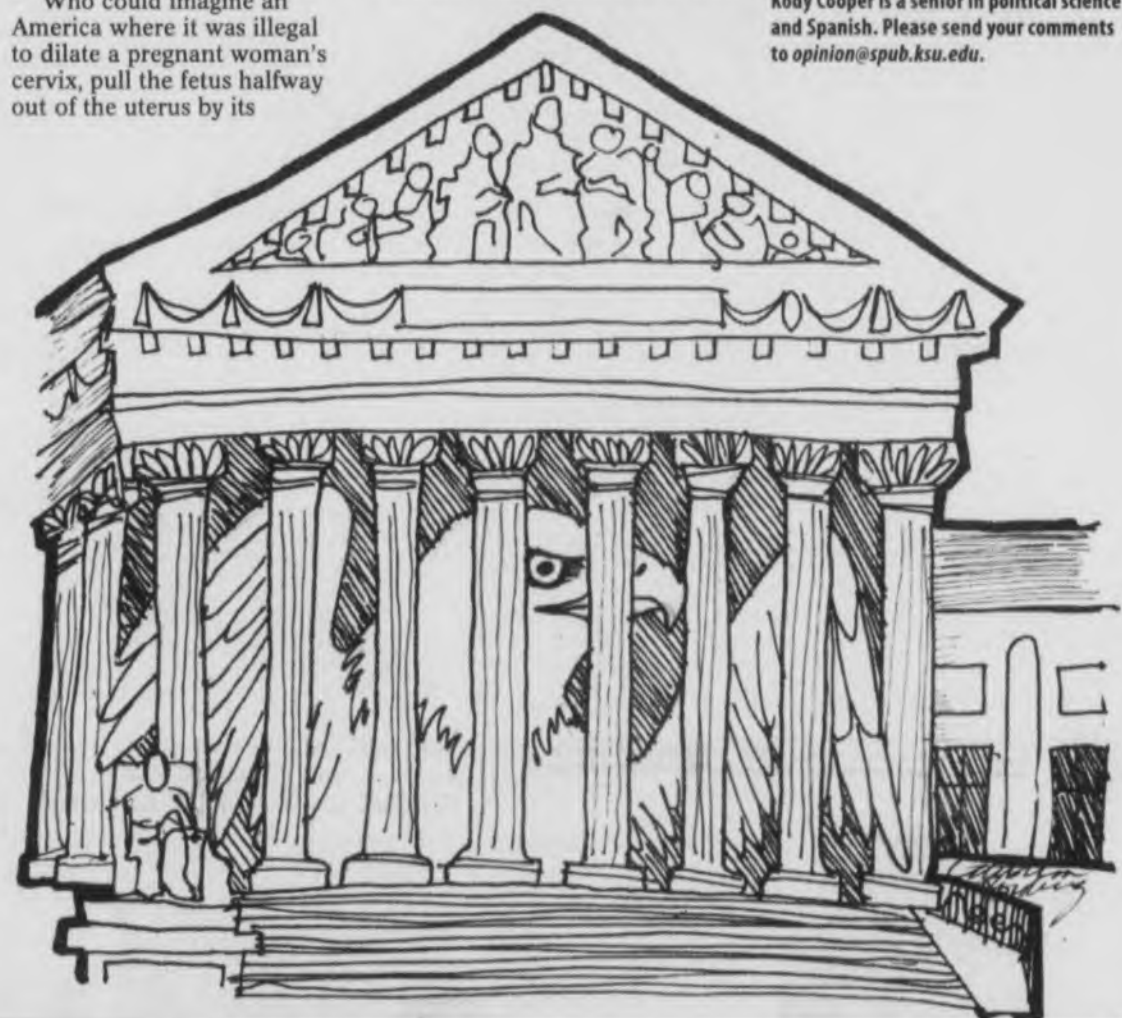

Sen. Kennedy: Ha! I knew it! You hate women and blacks, don't you?

Stenographer: Note to self, alcohol and liberalism not as good as advertised.

Liberia paves the way for female leadership

According to MSNBC, on Monday, Ellen Johnson-Sirleaf was sworn in as Liberia's new president.

She has become the first woman to ever be elected president of an African country.

"We recognize this change is not a change for change's sake, but a fundamental break with the past, therefore requiring that we take bold and decisive steps to address the problems that have for decades stunted our progress," Johnson-Sirleaf said in her inaugural speech quoted by the Associated Press.

This was an important step toward the future, not just for Liberia, and Africa as a whole, but rather for women around the world.

What is interesting to note is that Africa, not America, has more women emerging as political leaders.

America has had 42 male presidents since 1789, and shows no signs of electing a woman president any time soon. There have been whispers of Hillary Clinton running for president in 2008, but she has not yet declared any formal plans as to whether or not this is a reality.

A handful of women have run for the presidency, including Victoria Woodhull, who ran in 1872. She is said to have been the first woman ever to run for the presidency. Others have run, but it is almost impossible to name one without first researching the matter.

The main question is a matter of why women have not run for presidential office.

There have been several women mayors, senators, ambassadors and governors who have done many positive things for the people they represent.

So why haven't more women run for the highest-ranking position in America?

The women's liberation movement started more than 150 years ago, and with our country's fast advances in equal rights between races and genders, women should be encouraged to run for political offices.

It's interesting to note that both minorities and women have suffered the same discrimination and feelings of inequality since America was founded. Only religious and heterosexual white men are allowed to run for whatever political or leadership position they want, where others are victims of hate crimes and prejudice.

Women who attempt to bring attention to these injustices are labeled feminists, stereotyped, and their ideas are disregarded by society.

It is time to recognize women and minorities as equals and support them in powerful offices, such as the American presidency. American Women Presidents, a political action committee dedicated to electing a woman for president, has named several women that would plausibly be great nominees for president.

A couple of these are Condo-leezza Rice, the U.S. Secretary of State, and Kathleen Sebelius, the Governor of Kansas.

What a shame that it has taken 150 years to start giving more attention to the inequality in the gender of presidential nominees. People are saying 'it is time' for women to take charge and win more political positions, but for pioneering women on the liberation front, it has been time since women finally were given the right to vote.

If the women's suffrage movement had not occurred in the 1920-30s and later in the 1960-70s, would our country still be the same as it was in the 1800s?

It seems things only change in America if a large number of people complain about it.

If women had allowed themselves to be silenced, where would the United States be now?

America is very forward-thinking in many areas, but when it comes to the very basis of our constitution, equal rights, we still have a lot of work to do.

Fighting against the backlash

"First Impressions of Earth"

★★★★☆

Album review by Mark Sibilla

Hey, remember The Strokes?

With their 2001 debut, "Is This It," they were set to overtake the world and save rock 'n' roll with their mused hair, ripped denim and their energetic take on garage-rock. Unfortunately, you're not a 'somebody' for very long in the music industry.

As quickly as any music critic was prepared to hoist The Strokes onto their shoulders in 2001, they were equally as fast to shoot them down in 2003 for "Room on Fire." This underrated album was unfairly attacked for sounding too much like the same stuff from their debut.

The backlash had begun. Since then, a horde of pale imitators have flooded the market, giving us such embarrassments as Jet and The Redwalls.

What was fresh in 2001 is rotten today.

Jack White coped by taking The White Stripes in new, fascinating directions, but based on their latest album, "First Impressions of Earth," it seems The Strokes lack that focus.

What could have been a crowning achievement of a comeback album, their own "Rocket to Russia" or "The Queen is Dead" (both classic third albums following mediocre second albums by The Ramones and The Smiths, respectively), "First Impressions of Earth" is bogged down by a long run-time, failed experiments, and a surprising amount of filler.

"First Impressions of Earth" isn't horrible, but what could have been spectacular is just pretty good.

The album opens strongly, but around track five, the album becomes a haze of indistinguishable songs with only an occasional 'keeper' emerging here and there.

The pound of a kick-drum and the jangle of guitars from "You Only Live Once" open the album. The most surprising moment is when Julian Casablancas' vocals enter.

No longer buried under layers of reverb and distortion, Casablancas' lyrics and personality are in the forefront of the mix.

However, later in the album, this proves detrimental.

"You Only Live Once" is a pleasant track that showcases the band's instrumental interplay. Its joyful melody is countered by Casablancas' usual, snotty lyrical come-ons; the track even finds him taking chances by adding little flourishes of soul and R&B to his vocals to excellent effect.

The lead single, "Juicebox," is one of the most dynamic and exciting tracks The Strokes have recorded.

Bassist Nikolai Fraiture re-imagines the theme from "Peter Gunn" as a skuzzy, in-your-face grunge/surf-rock riff, which carries the song. The other band members step up and fall perfectly in place; the guitars squeal and swerve in-between one another while the drummer breathlessly keeps in time, and Casablancas' cocky lyrics are so up-front you can almost feel the spit hitting your face.

"Heart in a Cage" displays impressive guitar histrionics; granted, most of the lines are simple chromatic figures, but they are played with such intensity, they give chills.

"Razorblade" is another song full of wonderful, stylized guitar embellishments that hide just underneath the vocals; Casablancas even manages to sneak in a melody from Barry Manilow's "Mandy."

It's at this point when things get kind of shady.

"On the Other Side" has a great beat, but the band never manages to make anything out of it; the song simply flounders.

"Ask Me Anything" is a pretty change-of-pace, but it is ruined by Casablancas' lazy writing.

"Fear of Sleep" is simply painful to sit through – it takes a lot for me to skip a track, but as soon as this song hits, I scramble for the remote.

While there are breaths of fresh air, such as the Middle Eastern-sounding breakdown in "Vision of Division" and the great "Ize of the World," The Strokes' latest album is too long and has too much filler to be a truly great album.

After high expectations for this album, at its completion, the only thing I can do is disappointedly ask, "Is this it?"

New columnist offers dating, real life advice to peers

I am interested in someone I work with, but I am not sure if I should mix business with pleasure?

If you think you are prepared to date someone you work with, you need to be prepared to have the person you date really see you at work. Unless you are a supermodel, this means the person could see you tired, cranky and possibly in some unflattering form of work attire. Not to mention if you are in a competitive work environment, the guy that's buying your dinner may be competing with you for the cash with which to buy it. I like guys to see me properly tweezed, concealed and with just enough martini in me to make me hate my job a little less.

LAUREN ROHRER

How old is too old when it comes to dating? For instance, say I am 21 years old and I am interested in someone who is 30. Is there too much of an age difference to overcome? What about what people will say about us?

Age really is just a number. Ask yourself a question, where do you want to be at 30? Most would say they would want to have a good job, a degree (God-willing some of us might graduate) and a home. If you are dating someone who is honestly good for you and has all that going on, most of your friends will get over it and say you have it made. On the other hand, if the 30-year-old in question is an eighth-year senior, working part-time at the residence hall dining center and living in somebody's basement, your friends will rightfully call you a tool.

I am not a bar-going type of a person, so where would be a good place to go and meet new people?

The best situations are those that encourage conversation. Classes that are group discussion and project-based are great for meeting people. I know several people who date within their campus groups, like different ministries or special interest clubs. These are good because you know you have something in common with that person. I would, however, avoid places like loud concerts, lecture classes and other places that make visiting with someone difficult, if not impossible.

I met an interesting guy in the bars the other night, and we really hit it off. However, there was a lot of alcohol involved, so how can I be sure he likes me for me, and it's not just the liquor involved?

I've learned most of us make this common situation more complicated than it actually is. Question-Did he call the next day or the day after that? And if so, was it at a decent hour? If he didn't, you should really re-think the connection you had. Do you even remember what you talked about? Odds are, if you don't, neither does he. When dating in this town, the best thing to do is to always assume you are in the majority. Don't think you are going to be the one person out of a million who can turn a one-night-stand into a deeply meaningful relationship. It'll save you a lot of time, energy and precious cash that should be reserved for drinking with low-maintenance friends that like you drunk, sober and even hung over.

K-State aspires to build on victory over Kansas

By Mark Potter
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Six days ago, the K-State men's basketball team felt demoralized after opening Big 12 Conference play with two losses.

Apparently, one big win can change a team's mood.

When the Wildcats (10-4, 1-2) square off against Texas A&M (11-3, 1-2) tonight at Bramlage Coliseum, the two teams enter the contest with identical conference records.

But the Wildcats appear to have the momentum after coming off a 59-55 road victory against rival Kansas. With the win, K-State snapped a 31-game losing streak to the Jayhawks.

"I think that win built a lot of confidence within us," junior forward Cartier Martin said. "We really felt like our backs were up against the wall heading into that game."

Now, A&M is the team with its back against a wall.

Coach Billy Gillispie's squad will try to rebound from two consecutive losses to conference foes. The Aggies lost to Oklahoma and Oklahoma State by a combined three points, missing potential game-winning shots in both contests.

K-State leads the all-time series against Texas A&M 11-4, but the two teams are 2-2 in the last four meetings. K-State, however, is a perfect 6-0 against the Aggies in Manhattan.

Sophomore point guard Clint Stewart, who scored a team-high 15 points Saturday against Kansas, said his team stacks up pretty well against Texas A&M.

"We know they have two good players and a supporting cast around them," Stewart said. "We feel like if we come out and play the way we played in the second half against KU, we'll be fine."

Stewart, from Tulsa, Okla., said he has focused on becoming a better shooter.

"I'm trying to put more pressure on the defense by scoring," Stewart said. "I feel like if I can do that, it will help our team out."

Texas A&M's two leading scorers are junior guard Acie Law (16.2 points) and sophomore forward Joseph Jones (15.8 points).

Jones and Martin — K-State's leading scorer at 19.2 points per-game — played on the same AAU team in 2002 and 2003.

Martin said the two have kept in contact ever since.

"Playing with Joe (Jones) was a good experience," Martin said. "I hope I get a chance to guard him and show him a few things."

"I told him that when he comes up here, there is going to be some trouble," Martin joked. "(Jones) just told me that we would have some trouble guarding him."

CFB | Coaches use text messaging to woo recruits

COLUMBUS, Ohio — When John Peterson wants to make sure a prized recruit is thinking about playing football for Ohio State, he reaches for his phone — and types.

Buoyed by an NCAA rule change, more football and basketball coaches are text messaging recruits. Coaches still send letters and make phone calls, but some say the short messages transmitted from a cell phone or handheld device are more effective than traditional recruiting tools in communicating with prized prospects.

An NCAA subcommittee on recruiting picked up on the trend, voting in 2004 to change the designation of text messages to general correspondence. The rules change, which went into effect Aug. 1, 2004, treats text messages like letters instead of phone calls, which are limited based on the recruit's age, sport and time of year.

MLB | 2 Royals pitchers agree to 1-year contract

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — The Kansas City Royals agreed to one-year contracts

The 27-year-old Hernandez, 8-14 with a 5.52 ERA last year, gets $1,225,000. He was the opening-day starter in 2003 but missed the 2004 season following elbow surgery. He made $325,000 in 2005.

The 26-year-old Affeldt was converted to a middle reliever last year and finished with an 0-2 record and a 5.26 ERA in 49 games. He became the only pitcher in the AL to make at least 25 starts and 120 total appearances during the past three seasons.

HEMPSTEAD, N.Y. — Patriots defensive coordinator Eric Mangini was hired as New York Jets coach Tuesday, Mangini, a disciple of Bill Belichick, replaces Herman Edwards, who left for Kansas City after five seasons.

Mangini accepted an offer from the Jets on Monday night, a few hours after the team interviewed former Vikings coach Mike Tice. The deal was completed Tuesday morning.

Women ready to recover from previous road losses

By Matt Gorney
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Four games into Big 12 Conference play, the K-State women (12-3, 2-2) have recorded two wins and two losses. Both wins have come at Bramlage Coliseum, and both losses were in road games.

Tonight the Cats travel to Stillwater, Okla., to face Oklahoma State (6-9, 0-4) in their fifth conference test of the year.

"That's something we need to prepare for and I think we will be ready, but we've got to get our minds set and make sure we're ready for the first road win," junior guard Claire Coggins said about playing Oklahoma State.

Even though the previous two road games were losses for the Wildcats, the learning experience of playing in such games is important.

"That's one thing that those road losses have shown us is that we have to come prepared every night, and as freshmen, we're learning very quickly what it's like to play on the road and at home," freshman guard Shalee Lehning said. "We're going to get better, we're going to surprise a lot of people I think."

Coggins scored 10 points and had two steals in Saturday's home win against Colorado. Coggins is averaging 11.6 points per game this season but said there was always room for improvement.

"I still think I have a lot I can do for my team and I'm working every day, really hard, to try and get that done," she said.

The team is excited about playing in Stillwater and needs to perform at a high level, Coggins said.

"Rebounding is going to be huge for us and obviously defensive stops, but our offense has to come together and make sure we get good shots and o-boards," she said.

Oklahoma State enters the game against K-State on a four-game losing streak.

"It's another one of those opportunities to take a step that we haven't taken yet, and to me that's the greatest motivation," Coach Deb Patterson said. "We

Networks should not fear
Superbowl XL boredom

In its final season of being a broadcast station for the National Football League, ABC must be stuck in the fetal position right now looking at what possible matchup they might be faced with come Superbowl XL.

Goodbye, New England Patriots, and the same to the Indianapolis Colts.

Two teams the network could have marketed solely around the quarterbacks and a pending dynasty, had the Patriots recovered from a season decimated by injuries.

Instead, they will be stuck with teams known for the dreaded "D" word.

Downright boring possibly, but it is defense once again, which will rear its ugly head the first weekend in February on Ford Field in Detroit.

It was evident in this past week's offensive performance — not one player rushed for more than 100 yards, and only Patriot quarterback Tom Brady and Carolina's Jake Delhomme passed for more than 300 yards over the weekend.

The most marketable team left in the field is the Denver Broncos.

Their not-so-distant past when John Elway finally won the big game, something Dan Marino was never able to do with the Miami Dolphins and something Manning seems destined to repeat with the Colts.

ABC also can sell Pittsburgh as possibly becoming the first ever No. 6 seed from any conference to win the Superbowl, but it is highly unlikely they will get past the Broncos come this Sunday.

They would not have even beaten the Colts if the "idiot kicker," as Peyton Manning so eloquently called Mike Vanderjagt a few years back, prior to the Pro Bowl after Vanderjagt popped off on a Canadian television talk show saying the Colts would not win until Manning became a better teammate.

So, stand up network executives — it's not all bad.

Manhattan's current population of 47,916 residents, according to the latest U.S. Census Bureau report, which was released in 2000.

Some officials say the increase, which is near the equivalent of the student population, will cost apartment-seekers hundreds of dollars.

"We're not sure how it's going to play out," said Roger Luthi, owner of Alliance Property Management Inc., 1410 Poyntz Ave.

For this year, Luthi said he expects rent will modestly increase, followed by a more significant increase once the soldiers begin arriving in greater numbers.

Of the 22,000 individuals moving to the area, Moore said 8,000 are soldiers, 11,000 are dependents and 2,600 are civilian workers.

Some qualify for use of a reduced-interest loans fund of $25 million on top of other millions offered to the personnel.

To help alleviate the population problem, the Manhattan City Commission has discussed expanding low-income housing by building another unit in the future. Luthi also said his business and others, including Jardine Apartments, will continue to develop more apartments in Manhattan to prepare for the population influx.

Jardine Apartments is preparing for a multi-million dollar redevelopment. Officials are working closely with the state to finalize project details.

Luthi said as of now, troops are arriving more slowly, partially because they are assigned to help hurricane victims along the Gulf Coast.

With a slower population influx, Luthi said, students can enjoy the low costs and small-town population while it lasts.

"It's not going to affect college students much for this year," he said. "Students who wait for 2006-07 will have problems finding what they want in their price range and location."

CASINOS Legalizing Kansas commercial gambling sites

State representatives, including Gov. Kathleen Sebelius, argue that state-approved commercial casinos might help alleviate spending cuts and higher tax rates.

Statewide commercialized gambling is speculated for another debate in the Kansas House of Representatives and Senate, even after continuous failed attempts to approve it since the early 1990s.

That streak might end this legislative session, with 24 state senators saying they support a bill legalizing two new casinos in Kansas, according to a survey conducted by The Wichita Eagle — three votes more than what's needed to pass the bill.

Only five casino sites exist in Kansas — all on Indian reservations — but Foxwoods Resort Company plans to change that, bringing a taste of Sin City to Kansas. Marion, Harvey and Sumner counties are competing for the first casino location.

The company is proposing a site that includes a 300-room 12-story hotel, water park, an event center and parking garage, said Dennis Smith, of Law/Kingdon Inc., the architecture firm for Foxwoods Resort Company.

If approved, a Foxwoods Resort Company casino would bring in nearly 1,500 to 2,500 jobs that pay $12 to $15 an hour, said Bob Knight, Iowa Tribe of Kansas and Nebraska representative and former Wichita mayor.

haven't proven this yet. Can we go there and prove to ourselves that we're capable of getting a road win in the Big 12? But until we do it, believe me, it's the highest motivation I can think of."

Patterson also said each outing molds the K-State players into a better, more refined squad.

"I feel like we are always working on all phases of our game," she said. "There's still a lot more for us to learn. Every opponent will bring a slightly different look and match up and style, so you can never get comfortable."

Currently in a five-way tie for fifth place in the Big 12, Patterson said every conference game is a huge opportunity.

However, she also said no one game is more significant than any other. A win against Oklahoma State would push the Cats to 13-3 on the season and 3-2 in the conference.

COURT | Professor: Doctor-assisted suicide ruling unsurprising

The fulcrum of the case was whether Ashcroft and the federal government over-extended its authority by attempting to use the Controlled Substance Act to constrain Oregon doctors assisting in a patient's suicide.

Justice Anthony M. Kennedy, writing the majority opinion, said the "authority claimed by the attorney general is both beyond his expertise and incongruous with the statutory purposes and design."

The last time the Supreme Court dealt with doctor-assisted suicide was in the 1997 case Washington v. Glucksberg. The ruling, authored by then — Chief Justice William H. Rehnquist, stated there was no constitutionally protected right to suicide, and the matter was to be decided by the individual state.

In light of the Glucksberg case, John Fliter, associate professor of political science, said the outcome was unsurprising.

"I'm not too surprised that the court upheld the state law because the justices' focused on Attorney General Ashcroft's interpretation of the federal drug law, and given the language of that law, it looks like he went outside his discretion and official authority."

for use in conjunction with any political campaign, including any campaign for any office governed by these regulations."

Bremeyer said members of the Institutional Advancement will meet on a case-by-case basis to handle infractions of the rule.

Elections commissioner Tanner Banion said he has not received any complaints regarding the no logo policy.

"I don't think it will be a problem," he said.

Banion said the subject will be covered at the mandatory information meetings for all candidates Feb. 20 and 21.

If a candidate uses a copyright or trademark logo in campaign materials, he or she will receive a minor offense violation.

The candidate then has 72 hours to remove the materials, and failure to do so will result in another minor violation, Banion said.

Three minor offenses of the Elections Regulations Code are equivalent to one major offense, and major offenses are subject to review by the Elections Review Committee.

"I don't foresee a problem because a lot of the same people run every year," Banion said.

"So through word of mouth and knowledge of SGA, it's covered through the rule book and mandatory information meetings."

going to live in peace, we must do it together," Fallon said.

The marchers met at 6 p.m. in three different on-campus locations, Derby Dining Center, St. Isidore's Catholic Student Center and the Academic Resource Center of the Kramer Complex.

The marchers met up at the Union, where the candlelight vigil took place at 7.

Both the march and the vigil were sponsored by the K-State chapter of Alpha Phi Alpha Fraternity, Inc., Kappa Tau Chapter.

Alpha Phi Alpha has sponsored this event since the early 1980s.

Kiana Smith, sophomore in secondary education and Alpha Phi Alpha's Miss Black and Gold 2005, opened the vigil with a poem she had written about the life of King.

"If it weren't for Martin Luther King I wouldn't be able to stand here tonight and speak my mind," Smith said. "I just want to say thank you."

K-State's gospel choir, United Black Voices, performed two musical selections, followed by the keynote speaker of the evening, Kevin Powell.

Powell is a New York resident who is an activist, a writer, a cultural curator, a music producer and a public speaker, as well as a political consultant and fundraiser.

"Looking out there tonight I see people of different races sitting together peacefully — friends," Powell said. "It wasn't always like that."

Kansas joins National Fingerprint Files

By Sheila Ellis
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Kansas' criminal fingerprint files became more efficient by connecting to the National Fingerprint Files on Jan. 8.

Kansas became the eighth state to be added to the NFF.

"The NFF will save taxpayers dollars and give more accurate data," Kansas Bureau of Investigation Deputy Director Kyle G. Smith said.

Smith said the KBI handles more than 130,000 criminal fingerprint records every year.

In 2005, more than one million record checks of the Kansas central repository were conducted.

With the NFF, information exchange is improved by relying on Kansas to release its own records rather than having the less-complete national version of the record released.

Capt. Jeff Hooper of the Riley County Police Department said the police department submits all fingerprints electronically. He also said the NFF is helpful because if a suspect moves from state to state it is much easier to track them as we can get fingerprint records from other states quickly.

"Especially post-Sept. 11, it is important to share information and knowledge," he said.

Before Jan. 8, the procedure in Kansas had been to send off duplicate fingerprints and records for each felony and serious misdemeanor arrest in the state. The state's central repository at the KBI and the national repository with the FBI kept duplicate fingerprint and data records for each related arrest.

Now, when a law enforcement officer in another state needs a criminal history record on a subject of an investigation, the request is sent to the FBI. The FBI repository identifies the subject and from their records determines which states hold criminal history information for that subject.

If Kansas has all or some of the information, the FBI repository will electronically tell the KBI repository in Topeka to send that record to the requesting law enforcement officer. All transactions happen automatically and instantly without staff intervention.

"The entire purpose is to move to become more efficient and transfer into an electronic mode," said Dave Sim, Assistant Director of Kansas Bureau of Records.

For instance, if an individual is arrested in Kansas and then in Colorado, Colorado law enforcement officers directly ask Kansas for the fingerprints and data records, Sim said.

"Being connected to the NFF will benefit Kansas immediately with improved records of criminal justice," Sim said.

Since only one set of fingerprints is sent to the FBI, the transmission of records from Kansas to the FBI is reduced significantly under NFF, reducing complexity of data exchange from state and national depository.

President George W. Bush will be here Monday.

The president will deliver the 142nd Landon Lecture at 11 a.m. Monday in Bramlage Coliseum, Charles Reagan, chairman of the Landon Lecture Series, announced Wednesday.

Bush is the third sitting U.S. president to present a lecture and the sixth overall.

The topic of the speech will be the war on terror, White House spokesman Allen Abney said. No title for the speech has been given.

Abney confirmed that it will be the first time Bush has

Bush is the son of former President George H.W. Bush, who gave a Landon Lecture in 1985 while serving as former President Ronald Reagan's vice president, according to the Landon Lecture Web site. Reagan was the last sitting president to deliver a lecture, which was in 1982. Before Reagan, Richard M. Nixon delivered a Landon Lecture in 1970.

Bush defeated former Vice President Al Gore in the disputed 2000 election and was inaugurated Jan. 20, 2001. His first term saw the country weather the post-1990s recession, the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks and the invasion of Iraq to depose dictator Saddam Hussein.

Bush defeated Sen. John Kerry, D-Mass., in the 2004 election and was sworn in almost one year ago to begin his second term.

Democrats, Republicans alike anticipate presentation

Members of the KSU Young Democrats and KSU College Republicans alike plan to attend President George W. Bush's Landon Lecture on Monday morning.

"I can't wait for such a wonderful leader to be on our campus and get to share his thoughts with us," Jenna Newsom, secretary of College Republicans, said.

Newsom, junior in prepsychology, said she will wait in line for tickets before the booths open.

Jeff Smith, president of Young Democrats, said he also will attend the lecture, but he would rather have another speaker come. However, he said the Young Democrats probably will not protest Bush's lecture.

"As of right now, I don't see that happening," Smith, senior in political science, said. "It wouldn't be from my command."

Smith said Bush's appearance at K-State will give the university national recognition.

"Regardless of what I think, I think he is a historic president," Smith said.

Economic upswing assists graduating students

By Jonas Hogg
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Few students enter college with the hopes of being poorer at the end than when they started.

In recent years, the post-graduation job of choice can be difficult to come by.

According to a U.S. Department of Labor news release, 2005 saw two million net jobs created, bringing the total of working Americans to 142.8 million.

Kerri Day Keller, director of Career and Employment Services, said the increases are beneficial to students.

"I think that is an indicator we see, in addition to other indicators of an improving job market over previous years," she said.

A resource for examining job outlook is the Department of Labor Occupational Outlook Handbook. The handbook lists hundreds of occupations and includes descriptions of the work involved, working conditions, training qualifications and advancement, employment job outlook, earnings and related occupations.

An economic upswing during the last few years also has assisted students looking for employment, Keller said.

"We see that many of our graduates are successfully going on to full-time employment and graduate school or other career-related activities," she said.

Helping avoid a Kansas brain drain, most graduating students are choosing to stay in the state, with Missouri ranking second in importation of K-State graduates, possibly due to students returning to the Missouri side of the Kansas City area, Keller said.

As for the employers that come to K-State, Keller said there simply are not enough students to placate them.

"We have employers that would like to have even fuller schedules than they do," Keller said.

Some employers, such as Ferguson Enterprises, are not major-specific during the hiring process.

Keller said CES collects data on graduates six months after graduation, and found

A free service provided by the K-State Student Governing Association

Student, staff member awarded for service

By Jessi Hernandez
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Naureen Kazi and Keener Tippin II recently were recognized for their service to minority students when they were awarded with the Commerce Bank Presidential Awards for Distinguished Service to Minority Students by a K-State student and faculty/staff member.

Born to a Pakistani family and raised in Mexico City, Kazi, senior in advertising, came to K-State with knowledge of four languages and a desire to work with the Hispanic American Leadership Organization.

"Before she even came to K-State, she e-mailed me telling me that she wanted to be involved with HALO," said Doug Benson, professor of modern languages and HALO co-adviser.

Kazi was involved with more than HALO her freshman year, she said. She also was active in Student Governing Association and, in her second year, became the SGA multicultural affairs director.

Kazi also has been involved with Leadership Studies and Programs and K-State Multicultural Ambassadors. She has recruited students at high schools and community colleges in western Kansas.

During her two years as HALO president, she helped get the group recognized as the top 2003 outstanding student organization by the United States Hispanic Leadership Institute in Chicago.

"It's a total honor, just knowing the people who've given me this, that they feel I deserve it," Kazi said.

Growing up Tippin's home was always a place where students from Lincoln University and then the University of Missouri were welcome, he said.

"My father was an administrator at Lincoln and later the University of Missouri, where he worked in the admissions office," Tippin said. "Our house was a haven for those students."

In a piece he wrote for the Manhattan Mercury, Tippin said his own house is now that same haven.

Tippin, research news and features coordinator for K-State Media Relations and Marketing, has been the adviser for the Black Student Union since 2001 and has worked with numerous youth organizations in the Manhattan area.

"Keener's résumé is so outstanding because it affects current and future K-Staters," said David L. Griffin Sr., College of Education assistant dean for diversity. "He has taken the BSU to a new level. He will not allow mediocrity. He's proactive and realistic. He also works outside of the 'normal' university organizations, with the youth of the Manhattan community."

Underperforming USD students must enroll in summer school

By Kaley Lyon
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Students with poor academic performance are now required to take summer school.

Manhattan-Ogden USD 383 Board of Education members voted 7-0 Wednesday to make summer school required for both elementary and secondary students who don't meet certain criteria.

"Every year we kind of tweaked and changed summer school just a little bit because we realized that it was something we need to do," said Larry Liotta, principal of Amanda Arnold Elementary School. "We want to get the students to summer school who need to be there."

Elementary school students will be required to attend one of two three-week long sessions of summer school if they score at the bottom quartile of their class in state assessments.

The dates of these two sessions will be June 12-30 and July 10-28.

Students who are required to attend the summer program will not pay an attendance fee. However those who take summer courses by choice will be charged $100 for each three-week session.

This Extended School Year program for elementary summer school will be at three locations - Northview Elementary School, 300 Griffith Dr.; Lee Elementary School, 701 Lee St.; and Ogden Elementary School.

Last year, 323 students attended summer school, and the district expects about 800 students to attend this summer.

Free summer feeding programs will be provided at these three schools, and bus transportation will be available for students who live more than 2.5 miles from the nearest summer school location.

The goals of the elementary summer school program include increasing academic achievement for low-performing students, providing enrichment opportunities with high expectations of all students, providing for special education and English as a Second Language needs, providing intensive reading and math intervention and meeting the needs of families in the community by providing full-day care and enrichment opportunities.

"I think this is a great step, and I think it's been needed," board member Walt Pesaresi said.

The secondary summer school program will be required for students grades 7-9 who have an absence rate of 15 percent or higher during the academic year, failed classes in language arts, math or READ 180 for two quarters or more, have an insufficient number of credits to advance to the next grade level or by administrator or teacher recommendation.

Special education students with an Extended School Year IEP and students at Manhattan High School East Campus who need to complete the second semester of Algebra I will also be required to attend.

All students grades 7-12 will have the opportunity to enroll in core course credits beyond summer school requirements and participate in enrichment activities of their interest, such as driver's education and field biology.

Computer-assisted instruction using NovaNet and Plato also will be available to secondary education students. The facilities already are equipped with several computers, so technology won't be a problem, Liotta said.

This also will allow students to work at their own pace and allow them to finish a course before the four-week time period ends.

Secondary summer school courses will be at Anthony Middle School, 2501 Browning Ave.; Eisenhower Middle School, 800 Walters Dr.; and Manhattan High School West Campus, 2100 Poyntz Ave.

Instead of two three-week long sessions, the secondary education program will be June 5-30.

However, not all decisions on summer school requirements are final. One obstacle still facing the Board is determining the applicable methods and legalities that will make the summer program required.

"It seems to me that if this is important enough for us to say that this is required, then, my goodness, let's make it required," board member Peter Paukstelis said.

RCPD, stores crack down on DVD theft

By Logan C. Adams
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

It is a simple trick, really. A person steals DVDs from a retail store and takes them to a business that buys used movies to cash them in. The theft gets folded into retailers' bottom lines as a cost of doing business.

However, cooperation between several local businesses and the Riley County Police Department has helped to stop several people using this trick.

RCPD Det. Pat Tiede said the system has helped the RCPD uncover the thefts of more than 800 DVDs in 2005.

Digital Shelf, 706 N. 11th St., is one of the businesses that cooperates with the RCPD on its used DVD purchases.

Owner Scott Bauer said he helps with the program because his stores also experience theft of its products, and it hurts his stores more than it does the larger retailers.

"The biggest problem with DVDs is they cannot be serial-numbered, so there is no way to track which store they were stolen from," Bauer said.

He said his store pays between $1-$10 for used DVDs, but he will give someone more if he or she takes the payment as trade for other goods.

"Anyone who is trying to get the quick buck will never take trade," Bauer said.

Unlike Digital Shelf, pawn shops do have to share the information with the police.

Pat Livingston, owner of Pat's Pawn & Gun Shop Inc. in Ogden, Kan., said pawn shops are required by state law to inform law enforcement of all the property they take in.

Tiede said he has been working with several Manhattan video stores that buy back used DVDs to help capture persons who sell stolen property.

He said persons who return several copies of new films are likely to be investigated because it is unlikely a person bought numerous copies for his or her personal use.

There are two likely charges when these cases are prosecuted, Tiede said. The first potential charge is theft, and the second is felony attempt to disable the anti-theft device within a DVD's packaging.

In the event of a guilty verdict, he said the original store, if it can be determined, gets to decide whether to take the DVDs back or receive compensation from the perpetrator. The store that bought the stolen property gets the remaining option.

TO THE POINT K-State should cancel classes for Bush lecture

Whether you love him or hate him, Monday marks one of the few chances students will have to get a glimpse of one of the most powerful men in the world.

It would be terrible if anything could get between students and this rare chance to see the 43rd president of the United States.

Although unlikely, a professor ultimately could be the one to get in students' way during a speech that could change their lives. With no policy at K-State University that allows students to miss class for a Landon Lecture, something needs to be done.

The best option K-State has to correct the problem is to cancel all classes for Monday.

Yes, this will mark the second week that Monday classes have been skipped, but if the president of the United States isn't worth that, then who is?

Just canceling the classes, which are scheduled to interfere with the lecture, won't be enough. Although Bush was scheduled to speak at 11 a.m. in 2004 in Topeka, he didn't arrive until about 1 p.m.

It's already bad enough that classes are contending with the students' ability to get tickets.

If classes are cancelled Monday, those who are unable to get tickets will be able to at least take part in the event by watching it on TV or listening to it on the radio.

To the point is an editorial selected and debated by the editorial board and written after a majority opinion is formed. This is the Collegian's official opinion.

A true American hero

Humanitarian's friendly efforts remembered

Illustrations by Elvis Achelpohl | COLLEGIAN

On Jan. 10, North Korea announced to the world that we had let a hero's death go by unnoticed last August.

In a ceremony held in Portland, Ore., the late Ellsworth Culver became the first U.S. citizen, dead or alive, to receive North Korea's Friendship Medal.

The medal is awarded to citizens who perform outstanding work in striving for international peace.

What could Culver possibly do in his lifetime to achieve this level of respect from such a dangerous country?

Surely he must have been a terrorist or at least a loud-mouthed activist on the enemy's side, you may say. But this could not be farther from the truth.

He was a humanitarian.

ZACHARY T. ECKELS

In fact, Culver was more than just a humanitarian. In 1982, along with Dan O'Neill, he formed Mercy Corps, an organization that works to improve the living conditions of people suffering from world conflicts and disasters.

On Mercy Corps' Web site, www.mercycorps.org, you can read about his efforts.

While most Americans have been preparing to control countries in the "Axis of Evil" with threats and violence, Culver helped set up the National Committee for North Korea — an organization that advances engagement between citizens of our nations.

While we continue to worry about nuclear war, Culver's widow has been presented with his Friendship Medal.

When will we learn that violence is not the answer to society's problems?

At some point we all have to take a step back and realize how much better off we have it than the rest of the world.

The world doesn't hate us because we're free, they hate us because we're spoiled brats while they're starving in their streets.

Imagine how much better off our country would be if the money we've spent on killing innocent civilians and soldiers in Iraq had been spent on improving the people's living conditions.

Or if just half of the military's budget had gone toward humanitarian efforts instead of guns. Not only would we be saving lives, but our military budget would still surpass all others.

Yes, there would still be groups out there plaguing our country, but there wouldn't be nearly as many people listening to them.

We need to face world suffering head on and stop using violence to achieve our goals.

It's not too late to listen to what North Korea is telling us about Ellsworth Culver and make him that new hero.

Love, marriage can overshadow basketball

Getting up on the wrong side of the bed is one thing.

How about getting up on the wrong side of the bed realizing you just walked underneath a ladder as a horde of black cats make kamikaze sprints to cross your path?

Grabbing at a readily available long-handled object, you swing wildly to scatter the feline fiends, breaking a mirror, only to have your weapon "poof" open, revealing an umbrella whose precipitation protection does little good indoors.

It's going to be a long day.

This weekend, at the joining of two hearts in Hiawatha, Kan. I ambled over to an old friend to strike up a conversation. He recalled me as laughably unfortunate. A person "I could give a feather and an anvil to, and you'd come back with a broken anvil."

I took a look at the groom, an imposing figure who wrestled through state heavyweight finals with a separated shoulder and still made it to the medal stand. His jaw does a fair anvil impression.

The bride, barely 5'1", beckoned from across the room, and you would have thought she'd just hooked a bluegill on a steel cable the way he beelined to her side.

Love is one hell of a hard feather.

For the rest of their lives, neither one will ever get up on the wrong side of the bed alone.

Any mountainous obstacle rising in their path immediately will be reduced to half its size through the wondrous power of companionship.

Additionally, they will bask in each other's glory as equals, side by side. And when asked when they were the happiest individually, they would unquestionably include the other in the anecdote.

The inexplicable irony is life's greatest surprise. Who envisions their greatest moment as one shared?

An observation from a temporarily enlightened Kansan: no one dreams of drawing a walk in front of a game-winning homer or passing to the guy who drains a three at the buzzer.

Nevertheless, we daily commit acts of selflessness for love whose trite servility would make Barney gag.

How often do we set out to conquer with an iron fist only to willingly surrender to a silky touch?

The vexing polarity is that we intend to be the fiery passion that sets the world aflame and are only happy when the spark in another's eyes finds its kindling in our hearts.

About an hour prior to the ceremonies, some people heard the greatest news of their lives on their way to the church.

Akeem Wright's second free throw fell through the net with nine seconds left, and even we football fanatics knew there was no place from which to make a four-pointer in Allen Fieldhouse.

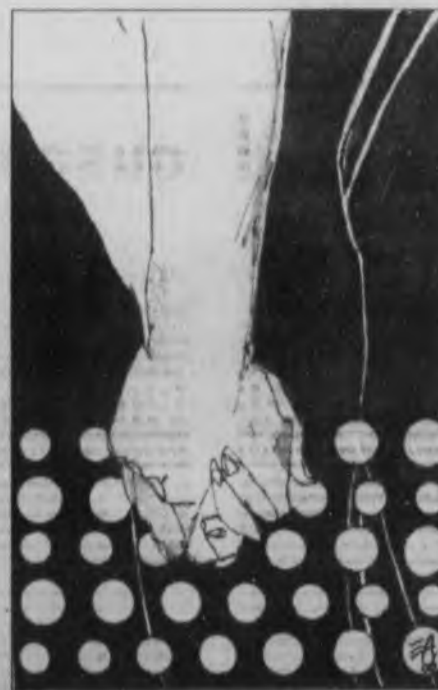

Perhaps we will forever hold Akeem and the '06 team in the absolute highest of Wildcat esteem, but for those two at the altar in Hiawatha, they were oblivious.

Sure makes it easier to remember the anniversary that way though.

Community service organizations help campus, city

By Kelsey Noel
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Several organizations at K-State include service projects among their activities.

Three such organizations include Alpha Phi Omega, the K-State Community Service Program and Inter-Varsity Christian Fellowship.

Alpha Phi Omega is a co-ed service fraternity. The organization, with about 30 members, helps on campus and around Manhattan, said Christopher Frampton, junior in chemical engineering and president of Alpha Phi Omega.

"We maintain the outdoor message boards on campus and clean them every few weeks," Frampton said.

Also, during the open house each year, we paint paw prints on the sidewalks from the Union toward several different buildings around campus."

Some Alpha Phi Omega campus projects are done on a yearly basis, Frampton said.

APO does many projects to benefit the community as well, he said.

"We spend a day helping with the Breadbasket by sorting donated foods, and we help the Salvation Army by sorting clothes and loading them into trucks," Frampton said.

APO members also volunteer at the Boys and Girls Clubs of Manhattan.

They help the children make crafts or do other activities, Frampton said.

Pat Bosco, dean of student life, said APO provides a model for other organizations to follow.

"Alpha Phi Omega service organization has provided decades of service to our entire university and community," Bosco said.

They were active here when I was a student."

Another group specializing in service is the Community Service Program.

Monica Parrish, senior in accounting and office manager for the Community Service Program, said the program began here in 1987.

"The K-State Community Service Program was an idea developed by Marv Kaiser, a member of Kellogg Fellowship and, at that time, head of the KSU sociology department," Parrish said.

Parrish said Kaiser requested a Fund for Improvement of Post-Secondary Education grant.

Kaiser wrote the proposal, and K-State was one of 32 nationally-funded programs to receive the grant, she said.

Soon after, the Community Service Program was created and Carol Gould was hired as director, Parrish said.

"We started with the Kansas Teams Program in 1987 and grew from there to the programs we have today," she said.

Currently, the Community Service Program is composed of K-State staff and volunteers and is open to anyone, said Kourtney Bettinger, senior in modern languages and student coordinator for the program.

"We have several organizations within the program, such as the alternative spring break, where students can go to sites in the Midwest to perform various services," Bettinger said.

S'Ambrosia Curtis, junior in pre-professional secondary education, paints a window sill Monday morning. Curtis is one of the members of InterVarsity Christian Fellowship who helps with community service throughout the year.

We also offer the chance for volunteers to participate in a tutoring program or be on an international or Kansas summer team."

The Community Service Program was in charge of organizing the service projects in Manhattan for Martin Luther King Jr. Day again this year, Bettinger said.

She said it was part of Community Connections, a group within the program through which students find ways to get involved in their community of choice.

InterVarsity Christian Fellowship participated in the events of Martin Luther King Jr. Day, as well, said Jared Miller, senior in civil engineering and president of InterVarsity Christian Fellowship.

"The group I worked with helped at the Manhattan Arts Center repairing broken shelves, painting and molding trim," Miller said.

Some other members went to Tuttle Creek and helped with trail-building, painting and clearing brush."

The group plans to do at least one major project that welcomes all students to participate, but that is led by InterVarsity Christian Fellowship and other campus ministries, Miller said.

Miller said volunteering is not something he does for his own benefit.

"I volunteer with InterVarsity Christian Fellowship because there is an overflow of love God has shown in my life, and I want to bring it to other people by helping them," he said.

Bosco said K-State is fortunate to have these service organizations committing their time to help others.

Sunset Zoo volunteers work with animals to gain experience

By Lola Shrimplin
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

As a docent at Sunset Zoological Park, Elise Neuer has the task of introducing curious visitors to the residents of the zoo.

Neuer said she hopes her experience as a docent, a volunteer who helps with zoo activities, will assist her in gaining entrance to the College of Veterinary Medicine.

"I do believe it will help," Neuer, sophomore in animal sciences and industry, said. "Being a vet, you don't work with just animals — you work with people, too."

Neuer said she previously worked at the Topeka Zoological park and spent most of her time in the tropical rain forest division.

"I would sit with this older man and talk about albino alligators," she said.

Neuer also works at Burlingame Road Animal Hospital, a small animal clinic in Topeka.

She has worked there for five years and goes there during school breaks. She works in surgery and other areas of the clinic.

The docent program at Sunset Zoo, 2335 Oak St., is a 12-week program that allows adult volunteers to assist with zoo activities. The fall 2005 graduating class had about 80 people.

Along with learning about the approximately 104 species of animals at the zoo, docents learn about the history of zoos in general and Sunset Zoo in particular.

The program's 200 docents also learn about marketing and how to relate to guests of the zoo, Rachel Soash, curator of education for Sunset Zoo, said.

All accredited zoos in Kansas have a docent program, Soash said.

Ryan Bradburn, senior in animal sciences and industry, said he recently was accepted into the College of Veterinary Medicine. Bradburn's experience as Webmaster for the program assisted him with his application to the college, he said.

Bradburn said his favorite animal at Sunset Zoo is the pygmy marmoset, a small monkey.

"He's my favorite little critter," Bradburn said.

Erinn Bock, junior in wildlife biology, said she became interested in the docent program after attending a meeting of the KSU Student Chapter of the Wildlife Society.

Bock, who graduated from docent training in December, is the publications chair for the docent program. Before joining the program, Bock worked in the rehabilitation department at the Hutchinson Zoo in Hutchinson, Kan.

The docent program will assist Bock with her future career aspirations, which include working at the Australia Zoo, she said.

The docents also observe students from the College of Veterinary Medicine as they work on the exotic animals, she said.

"Obviously they (the docents) don't treat the animals," Bock said. "They mostly watch the vet students."

Sunset Zoological Park docent Holly Lusby plays a game with Jessica during the zoo's Parana School class Monday afternoon. Docents are volunteers who assist with zoo activities.

Close game wins prove Cats can play NCAA tourney

One of the biggest reasons I love sports is because you never know exactly what could happen on any given day.

CEDRIQUE FLEMING

Teams are always losing when they aren't supposed to, and there is always some sort of record to be broken.

Last weekend showcased a little of both.

One of the biggest surprises came when the Indianapolis Colts, who were favorites to win the Super Bowl, lost at home to the Pittsburgh Steelers in the American Football Conference divisional play-offs 21-18.

Another unbelievable thing happened when the three college basketball programs with the most victories in NCAA history all lost at home on the same day, which had never happened before.

Alabama defeated Kentucky, Miami upset North Carolina, and I'm sure you've heard by now that our very own K-State ended a 31-game losing streak to arch rival Kansas.

This win meant so much to the Wildcats, not only because of the streak, but because they proved they have what it takes to finish close games, especially in hostile environments like Allen Fieldhouse.

Dramane Diarra and Cartier Martin both hit clutch shots down the stretch, helping seal the victory for the Wildcats, and I have not seen the Cats rebound and defend that well all season.

The men further proved their ability to finish on top in close games Wednesday night as they edged out Texas A&M, 58-54, at home in Bramlage Coliseum.

After the debacle against Nebraska, it was refreshing to see how great this team can be when they are all on their game.

If they can continue playing like they did against KU and forget the Nebraska game ever happened, they can compete with anybody in the Big 12 Conference and get into the NCAA Tournament at the end of the year.

Each week, ESPN has its idea of what the 65-team NCAA Tournament bracket would look like if the season were to end today, and as of last weekend, the Wildcats were considered a "bubble" team.

To pop the bubble and get into the tournament, the Wildcats will need to win 20 games.

To do that, they will need to beat the teams they are supposed to, like Baylor and Colorado, and get a couple upsets along the way against teams like Texas and Missouri.

They also will need a strong showing in the Big 12 Tournament, let's say making the semi-finals, something they haven't done since 1999, when they lost in the semis to Kansas, 69-58.

If they can pull off these feats, they will do what we as fans have been hoping for years — make the NCAA Tournament.

I see no reason why this team can't show the grit and determination they showed against Kansas and win enough games to make the tournament.

Hey, fellas, I've got one thing to say to you — go out there every night and take what's yours.

Be one of those teams that does something nobody expects it to, and get into the tournament, because you deserve it.

Wildcats move to a 2-2 in conference play after 58-54 victory

By Nick Dunn
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Catrina Rawson | COLLEGIAN

K-State's Tyler Hughes pulls down a basket during the Wildcats' 58-54 win over Texas A&M on Wednesday. Hughes put up eight points and had nine rebounds for the Wildcats.

It certainly was much closer than most K-State fans would have wanted, but K-State's men's basketball team managed to claw out a 58-54 victory against Texas A&M on Wednesday night in Bramlage Coliseum.

The win moved K-State's record to 11-4 overall and 2-2 in the Big 12 Conference.

The story was all too familiar for the Aggies (11-4, 1-3), who lost their third-straight Big 12 Conference game by four points or fewer. In each of those games, Texas A&M missed at least one potential game-winning shot in the final minute.

The Aggies were in need of a victory, and Coach Jim Wooldridge said he was impressed with the way his team was able to hold off a team with its back against the ropes.

"I'm very proud of our team tonight," Wooldridge said after the win. "A&M comes in here, and they're fighting for their lives. They played very physical, very hard, and we matched it and beat them."

In the second half, it looked as if K-State would cruise to an easy victory when it opened up a 43-29 advantage after junior forward Tyler Hughes scored on a layup with 11:20 left in the game.

However, Texas A&M guard Acie Law had a different plan in mind. Law caught fire, totaling 22 second-half points. Through the first 15 minutes of the half, Law scored 18 of his team's 19 points. In all, Law tallied 28 points on 10-of-17 shooting from the field.

Wooldridge said he thought it was remarkable to see so many shots fall from such an unusual shooting style.

"If you watch that ball in flight, it's a knuckleball," Wooldridge said of Law's shots. "But it goes in. I thought we defended well, but (Law) is a guy that can create his own shot, and he was a tough matchup for us. He's a tough matchup for anybody."

With Texas A&M trailing 56-54 with 19 seconds remaining, Law found himself open at the top of the key. He misfired on that 3-pointer,

Bench play, enthusiasm contribute to win

By Mark Potter
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

K-State fans seemed anxious to cheer on the men's basketball team against Texas A&M on Wednesday night as the Wildcats sought to build on Saturday's 59-55 win over rival Kansas.

The crowd of 7,411 at Bramlage Coliseum roared during a pre-game video featuring highlights from Saturday's win that broke K-State's 31-game losing streak to Kansas.

The fans' pre-game enthusiasm was only a sign of things to come.

K-State's bench play brought more cheering from the Wildcat faithful, especially from the student section.

K-State's reserves contributed to its 58-54 win over the Aggies by scoring a combined 25 points compared to nine for Texas A&M.

Nine players played at least 10 minutes, including guard Schyler Thomas.

"We have a lot of guys who can play a lot of minutes," Thomas said. "Some guys may not play as much as they want to, but when they get their shot, everybody seems to be producing."

One reserve who stepped up was junior guard Lance Harris, who has started all but two games this season.

The crowd roared after Harris sank his third crucial free-throw to extend K-State's lead to 58-54 with three seconds left in regulation, sealing a Wildcat victory.

"I knew what I did to miss the first (free throw)," Harris said. "I was squeezing the ball a little too tight, and I made the adjustment."

Harris, despite struggling in recent games, finished with 11 points on four-of-six shooting in 24 minutes of play.

Junior forward Tyler Hughes also provided a spark off the bench by snatching a team-high nine rebounds and scoring a season-high eight points on three-of-four shooting in 16 minutes of action.

"Coach just asked me to come in and play hard and give some energy to this team, so that's what I do,"

Coggins leads Cats to victory against Cowgirls

Staff Reports
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

A game-high 21 points, four-rebound performance from junior guard Claire Coggins helped lead K-State to its first Big 12 Conference road win Wednesday night.

The Wildcats (13-3, 3-2 Big 12) defeated Oklahoma State (6-10, 0-5), 67-57, to secure their fourth-straight victory against the Cowgirls.

Also scoring in double figures were sophomore guard Kimberly Dietz with 13 and freshman forward Marlies Gipson with 10.

Coggins started the night knocking down four 3-pointers in the first five minutes of the game, and the Wildcats continued to lead Oklahoma State throughout the entire first half, closing it out with a 33-20 advantage.

"I think that anytime someone can come out and hit a lot of threes, it gives our team momentum and gets us up scorewise," Coggins said. "It gave me confidence to shoot more."

K-State shot 41.4 percent, compared to Oklahoma State's 38.6 percent.

After gaining a comfortable 59-37 lead in the second half, the Cowgirls went on a 13-2 run, cutting the K-State advantage to 11 points. However, in the second half, Oklahoma State was not able to get closer than eight points.

"Anytime we can win, we're excited," Coggins said. "We're still trying to learn how to get and keep a lead and how to finish off a game strong."

NFL | Payton introduced as new Saints coach

NEW ORLEANS — Cowboys assistant Sean Payton was introduced Wednesday as the New Orleans Saints' new head coach, inheriting a team that won three games last season and played all its contests on the road because of Hurricane Katrina.

Payton

Payton takes on his first head coaching job after serving under Bill Parcells at Dallas, where he coached the quarterbacks and also held the title of assistant head coach. Before that, he was a New York Giants assistant, a stint that included that team's NFC championship in 2000.

Payton succeeds Jim Haslett, whose tenure lasted six years. The Saints went 3-13 in 2005, but were a .500 team during Haslett's first five seasons combined. The victories include the team's only playoff win.

Apple releases Intel-powered computers, MacBook Pro laptops with iSight

By Travis Hudson
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

After nearly a year of rumors and talk, the Intel-powered Apple computers were finally unveiled at the MacWorld Expo on Jan. 11 in San Francisco. Two new iMacs were unveiled featuring the Intel Core Duo processor. A new line of laptops, called the MacBook Pro, was also released. The line will feature two new models, both powered by the Intel Core Duo processor.

APPLE IMAC

The new iMacs are said to be two to three times faster than the current iMac G5. There will be two versions available, 17-inch and 20-inch models.

"I think it will ultimately be for the better," said Duncan Oliver, sophomore in electrical engineering. "I believe that the new chips will perform better, and I enjoy the prospect of possibly running both Windows and Mac OS X on the same system."

According to Apple's Web site, the new iMacs will feature the latest Apple software: OS X Tiger, the new iLife '06, and Front Row with the included remote. They will also have an integrated iSight camera and the SuperDrive CD/DVD burner.

Jason Deehr, sophomore in fine arts and an Apple campus representative, said the 17-inch iMac starts at $1,199 and the 20-inch model starts at $1,599 with the Apple education discount available online or at the K-State Student Union Computer Store.

"Nothing has existed in the computer world compared to this," Deehr said.

Both models of the iMac are available in the computer store.

APPLE MACBOOK PRO

The MacBook Pro will be available in two models: a lower-end model featuring the 1.67Ghz Intel Core Duo and a higher-end model featuring the 1.83Ghz Intel Core Duo.

They also are upward of four times faster than the latest PowerBook G4s available. The MacBook Pros are both 15.4-inch models, but there are already rumors circulating of 12-inch and 17-inch models to come later this year.

According to an Apple press release, the laptops also feature a new MagSafe power adapter.

The MacBook Pro will eliminate the PC card slot that has become standard on all types and brands of laptops. They will be trading the traditional PC card slot for a proprietary ExpressCard.

Peripheral manufacturers have already announced plans to release ExpressCard versions of their current peripherals.

The models will begin at $1,799 for the lower-end and $2,299 for the higher-end with the Apple education discount, Deehr said.

Both models of the MacBook Pro are on order from the Computer Store. They will be available in February or March, Deehr said.

"Most people won't know the difference between the old and new at first, but over time they will eventually learn what the benefits are and possibly make the switch," said Parker Rome, freshman in pre-journalism and mass communications.

Rome said he plans to wait at least a year before considering a purchase because he wants to see what will happen with this new breed of computers.

APPLE ACCESSORIES

Apple also announced the release of the iPod Radio Remote.

Apple iLife '06 suite

Apple's iLife '06 suite features iPhoto* 6 and a new photo-casting program for sharing photos over the Internet. It also features iMovie HD 6 and iDVD 6 for authoring custom DVDs for today's widescreen TVs.

GarageBand 3 now offers the ability of creating professional-quality pod-casts.

iLife '06 also introduces iWeb, a new iLife application that allows users to create Web sites with photos, blogs and pod-casts. Apple will allow users to publish Web sites on .Mac for viewing by anyone on the Internet.

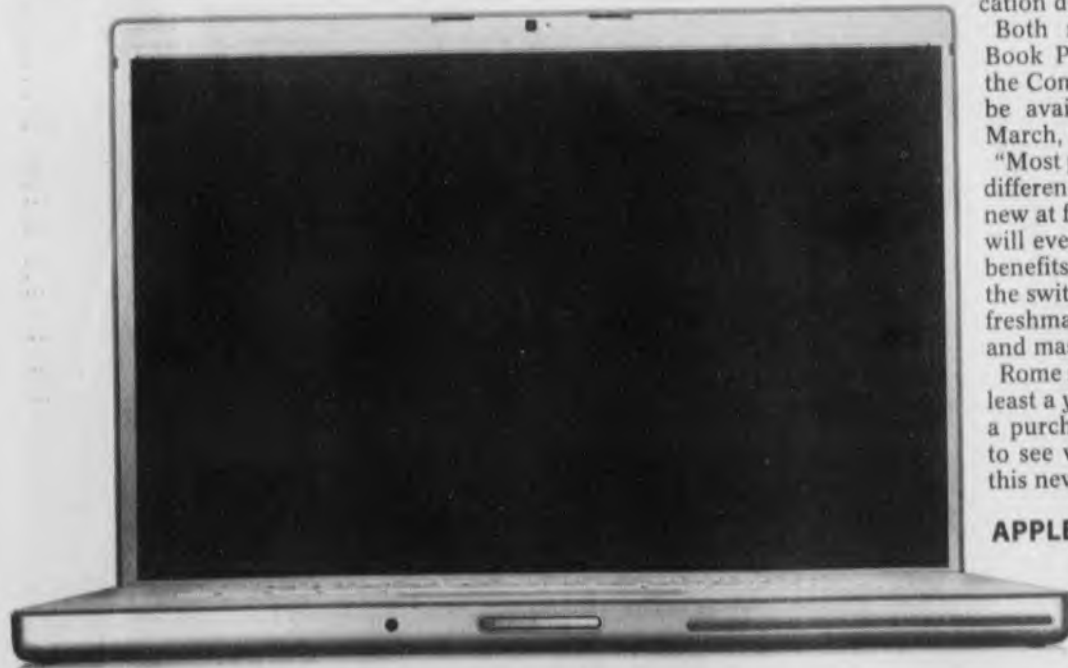

Source: Apple.com

The iPod Radio remote is a combination corded-remote and FM tuner for the new fifth generation of nano iPods.

Even though accessories like these have been available for some time, this is the first combination accessory licensed from Apple.

The iPod Radio remote will be in stock at the Computer Store within the next few weeks and will cost $44-$49, Deehr said.

Additionally, MacWorld saw a release of the Apple iLife '06 suite. Within the suite, GarageBand gained the addition of a pod-casting studio. The iLife suite also saw the addition of a new application called iWeb, an all-inclusive Web publishing/blogging software.

MacBook Pro, powered by a dual-core Intel engine, is up to four times the speed of the PowerBook G4. Prices for the MacBook Pro start at $1,799 with student discounts.

Special pricing gives students a break on computers

By Megan Green
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Students may not have to empty their wallets to pay for a computer or computer software.

The K-State Student Union Computer Store and Varney's Book Store offer a special discount for students, called academic, or educational, pricing.

Only computer stores that are connected to universities around the country can give students academic pricing.

"Computer companies know students don't have money," said Jason Deehr, Apple campus representative. "So students get the discount to curb piracy and to help students develop good computer skills and maintenance for later."

Varney's gives discounts on Dell and Gateway computers and software, offering 4 to 12 percent off the regular price.

Jeff Levin, store owner, said students can buy in the store and online.

"You can log on to www.shopvarneys.com and still get the discount buying online," he said. "You have to go through a special location on the Web site, and students have to enter their ID."

Levin said computers can be delivered to Varney's or to the purchaser's house.

The Computer Store offers more than 50 percent off of Mac computer prices and also offers specials.

Currently, the Union Computer Store is offering the 12-inch iBook for $700 and the 14-inch for $769.

Students will receive a free iPod Nano if they purchase either of these computers and Apple Care, or insurance for the computer.

Clay Hensley, sophomore in pre-professional business management said he compared prices when he was looking for a computer.

"I bought from the Union store because it is the cheapest."

The Union Computer Store offers Microsoft Office software to K-State students for $70.

The Union Computer Store also offers a student discount for computers to anyone with a student ID, including high school or junior high school IDs, and faculty or staff.

The Union Computer Store and Varney's will help students with computer problems.

"I bought my computer one year ago from the Internet," Rachel Mullet, senior in kinesiology, said. "My Mac was having some problems, and the Union store fixed it for free."

Deehr said there are also help sessions for students with Mac or Apple computers every Wednesday outside the Union Food Court.

TV series get the ax

Over the past few days at the annual Television Critics Association gathering in Pasadena, the network chiefs have been racking up the body count with their announcements of axed shows.

In case there was any doubt, they confirmed that this season will be the last for The WB's "7th Heaven" and Fox's "Malcolm in the Middle," and "That '70s Show."

ABC is halting production on Heather Graham's "Emily's Reasons Why Not" after just one airing; no word on whether the five remaining completed episodes will ever air. ABC's "Jake in Progress" is also on indefinite hiatus.

Handwritten Beatles lyrics for sale in auction

NEW YORK — John Lennon's handwritten lyrics to the Beatles song "A Day in the Life" are up for sale and auctioneers Bonhams said on Tuesday they could fetch around $2 million.

"Based on market history, we believe somewhere in the neighborhood of $2 million," could be the final sale price, Martin Gammon of Bonhams said. That could make the lyrics "the most valuable musical manuscript composed in the 20th century to be offered at auction," he said.

The sealed bidding process will close March 7. The lyrics are owned by an unnamed collector who bought them at auction in 1992 from the estate of one of the Beatles' road managers.

Unprecedented Oscar push for 'Crash'

LOS ANGELES — Independent film studio Lionsgate, buoyed by surging acclaim for its racial drama "Crash," said on Thursday it has sent more than 130,000 DVD copies to Hollywood insiders as part of an unprecedented Oscar campaign for the movie.

The huge scope of the "Crash" DVD mailing, including copies to all members of film industry guilds for actors, writers and producers, dwarfs what most studios regard as a major Oscar "screener" blitz — typically running 12,000 to 20,000 copies.

Immersed in her artwork, Julie Gibbs, graduate student in fine arts, has her master of fine arts thesis exhibition currently showing in the Mark A. Chapman Gallery in Willard Hall. Gibbs' inspiration was the lines of the human figure. Her exhibition runs until Jan. 28.

Balancing Act

Artist portrays life lessons in pieces showcased at exhibit

By Lacey D. Mackey
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

A thick tangle of weeds woven together comes into focus as the waves of steel covered in green and blue glaze give the illusion of a thicket.

For Julie Gibbs, graduate student in art, that thicket is a haven to keep her life balanced, she said.

Gibbs' master of fine arts thesis exhibition, "The Balance," will be on display in the Mark A. Chapman Gallery on the first floor of Willard Hall until Jan. 28. An artist's reception will be 5-7 p.m. Friday.

As the youngest child in a large family, Gibbs said she watched with interest when her older sisters in middle school brought home their sketchbooks and pencils from art class.

"By the time I was six, I was copying drawings from a dictionary with a pencil," Gibbs said. "I began to have preferences, and I tried to find the nubs of my sisters' drawing pencils."

Gibbs said she had her first solo art show when she was in fifth grade after she experimented with oil and temper paints.

"I began to bring these to my teacher, and she said, 'I want you to bring all your drawings! I brought them, and she put them all up on the bulletin board, and she left them up,'" Gibbs said.

After continuing her education for a short time in college, Gibbs said she turned away from art.

"I got married and worked," she said. "I tried not to be an artist because it wasn't real popular from the society I came from. But years of experience taught me I am an artist."

The crowning moment, Gibbs said, came when she made a drawing for her boss at a meat-packing plant. After seeing her work, Gibbs said he encouraged her to pursue her talent.

"He said, 'You shouldn't be sitting here, wrapping meat. You should go to art school,'" Gibbs said.

Gibbs' show includes works of ceramics, glaze and steel that reflect her life.

"I am 43 years old, and I am looking at the balance of my life," she said. "Balance in your life is really important. As a child, I was taught to work hard, but I was not taught how to take care of myself. It's OK to take a day off."

After working for three semesters on a series of figure drawings, Gibbs said Yoshi Ikeda, professor of art, encouraged her to step away from her work on the figure and try something new.

"I analyzed my love of figure drawing to one element, how the lines relate to one another," she said.

Gibbs' "Thicket Series" is a group of steel pieces colored with various glazes and covers a large portion of the gallery.

"When I was young, there was a plum thicket with this empty place in the middle, kind of like a playhouse," Gibbs said. "I needed a safe place, so I thought I would make a thicket."

"The Scapegoat Series" began from Gibbs' interest in the actual meaning of the term "scapegoat." Gibbs found the word came from Judaic times when an unblemished goat was used as a sacrifice for the sins of all members of a tribe.

Gibbs said she took this idea and created a series of ceramic pieces with the goat as its uniting piece.

Penny Senften, director of the Manhattan Arts Center, said she has enjoyed having Gibbs work as clay studio manager at the arts center. Gibbs' work, Senften said, sets a high standard for others.

"She's just very courageous," Senften said. "She comes up with different ideas. Her work, it makes you stop and think a little bit."

Duane Noblett, head of the Department of Art, said each piece of Gibbs' work engages the viewer as a whole.

"We're pretty accustomed to be caught up in the individuality of a piece," Noblett said. "In the case of her work, it's like, 'Welcome to Julie Gibbs.'"

Noblett said the pieces draw in the viewer.

"For students to come in and look at it, they will want to come back," he said.

New Web site promotes city

By Lola Shrimplin
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

James. Hackworth, lab technician for the College of Veterinary Medicine, had two motives for starting a new Web site featuring Manhattan.

One was to promote Manhattan and centralize information about the city.

"I just saw a need for that in the community," Hackworth said.

He also saw it as a way to promote Hackworth Design Studio, his design business.

Hackworth graduated from K-State in 2004 with a bachelor's degree in graphic design and focused mainly on print design. He started his own business one month after graduating.

He taught himself Web design, as well as search engine optimization after graduation, and now his Web site features information on restaurants, real estate, local events and a business directory.

There were 450,000 visitors to the site in 2005, and hopefully that number will increase this year, Hackworth said.

The College of Veterinary Medicine's Web site links to Hackworth's site.

"The Vet School completely dropped links to apartments and now link to my Web site," Hackworth said.

The link to Hackworth's site was established last month, after realizing the information on the college's Web site wasn't up to date, said Joseph Nisil Jr., computer information specialist for the College of Veterinary Medicine.

The link to the site gives students at the college a one-stop location to find information about housing and shopping, which is beneficial, especially to those who are not familiar with the area, Nisil said.

Local businesses advertise on the site.

Jay Nelson, owner of the Strecker-Nelson Gallery, 406 1/2 Poyntz Ave., said he is pleased with his advertisement on the site.

"I think that the Internet is one of the more effective types of advertising," Nelson said.

The site is geared toward the community of Manhattan and K-State, and it would benefit anyone who wanted to advertise or offer information about upcoming events, Hackworth said.

"I'm really looking for input from the community," he said.

The Web site also offers "Skewed View," which is an offbeat look at events around Manhattan and Kansas.

"Anyone who would want to contribute can," he said.

Advocate focuses on foster care

By Holly Smith
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Melissa Boisen, child advocate and former registered lobbyist for The Farm Inc. created the Children's Ombudsman Web site in December in an effort to improve conditions for children in foster care.

"What led me to create this site was a real frustration that we weren't able to achieve great outcomes for kids," Boisen said.

Boisen said the Children's Ombudsman serves as a neutral mediator by gathering facts and giving them to the proper authorities.

"My goal is to keep legislature informed of current issues dealing with neglected children," Boisen said.

Because the Children's Ombudsman Web site is not a state program, it does not receive government funding. Boisen has maintained and funded the site on her own.

"I have volunteered my time for the site, and I had to learn how to do it all," Boisen said.

When filing a complaint, the person filing is given an identification number, keeping the case anonymous.

"There is no question that tragic things sometimes happen to children in foster care," said Jacque Gibbons, licensed specialist clinical social worker and professor of social work in the Department of Sociology, Anthropology and Social Work. "And a lot of people don't want their name on a complaint because it may be the next door neighbor they are reporting."

Manhattan-Ogden USD 383 Board of Education member Peter Paukstelis said the site has the potential to benefit Kansas foster care.

"Anytime we increase the information out there, it is a step in the right direction," Paukstelis said.

Students provide hands-on hurricane relief

By Kaley Lyon
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Five months after Hurricane Katrina devastated the Gulf coast, destruction from the storm is still too vast to describe, said Casey Mattke, senior in agricultural economics.

"Honestly, I wish I had words to describe how completely, completely devastated the area is," Mattke said. "Think of a tornado in Kansas — the town looks destroyed for about a mile. Picture that for hundreds and hundreds of miles — nothing. It's absolutely incredible. And that's five months later."

Farmers and ranchers were among the millions of people affected by the storm, which is how Mattke and four other K-State students received the opportunity to travel to southeastern Louisiana, where they offered hands-on assistance to four farmers and ranchers.

The five students are members of Alpha Zeta, a national professional honor society for men and women in agriculture.

Eighteen student members from throughout the nation, along with Brian Reuwee, associate director of Alpha Zeta, spent Jan. 5-10 building a shed, putting up a mile and a half of fencing and clearing debris from farm grounds that had been destroyed.

"We helped four or five people, but what we were able to do for them was something they couldn't get done on their own," Reuwee said. "Talking with one of the farmers, he said what we did in two days would have taken him three months to do — he couldn't afford help."

In addition to the Louisiana Farm Bureau, the Alpha Zeta Foundation Inc., which consists of 3,000 student members in 74 chapters across the country, paid for all trip expenses.

The students lived in the residence halls of the Southeastern Louisiana University in Hammond, La.

Mattke said he was touched by the strength and the generosity of the people who had lost so much in the wake of Katrina.

"The farmers and their families were just so generous," Mattke said. "They worked for every last thing they had but were willing to invite us all into their homes and cook dinner for us. It was just amazing for me the quality of people we had the opportunity to work with."

The students also were rewarded for their work. They were able to take a night off and experience nightlife.

"It was awesome. The French Quarter really didn't have that much damage," said Audrey Vail, senior in agricultural communications and journalism. "Most of the bars were open, most of the restaurants were open, some were prepared to open the next week. It was Bourbon Street — it was fun. We definitely had a good time."

Among the farmers the group helped was a man whose crop had been destroyed.

"His whole property was underwater," Mattke said. "The salt from the salt water is toxic to citrus trees and killed them all."

Mattke said that while monetary donations are needed for reconstruction, the best relief comes from physical work.

"What they need down there is people," Mattke said. "They need bodies, they need food, they need people who are skilled laborers. I'm like anybody else — if I hadn't gone down there, I probably would have just sent $100 and said, 'There's my contribution.' Being down there you actually physically help the change."

and when the Aggies grabbed the rebound and passed it back to him for another try, Law missed again.

"I just rushed them," Law said of those two shots. "I got so tight because I wasn't thinking I'd be that wide open, and when I was, I just rushed them."

Another problem for Texas A&M was that Law could not seem to get any help from his teammates.

Texas A&M forward Joseph Jones suffered through a 2-of-10 shooting night, largely due to strong defensive efforts from Hughes and senior forward Dramane Diarra.

"Dramane and I guarded (Jones) pretty well," Hughes said. "We watched a lot of film on them. The coaches had everything ready for him."

For the Wildcats, it was, once again, junior forward Cartier Martin who paced the team with 17 points, 12 of those coming in the second half.

Junior guard Lance Harris, who has been plagued by a shooting slump for much of the season, helped out with 11 points, including two free throws to ice the game with three seconds to play.

Hughes also came off the bench and was close to a double-double, with eight points and nine rebounds.

K-State played a relatively clean game on the offensive end, shooting 44.9 percent and committing only 12 turnovers.

"That's a miracle for us," Wooldridge said of the turnover total. "Not a big miracle, but a slight miracle."

The Wildcats now look to carry their momentum over to the next game, a home contest Saturday against the suddenly-streaking Missouri Tigers.

Martin said the team's confidence is increasing as a result of its recent games.

"Winning tonight's game boosted our confidence," he said.

BUSH | Bramlage expects long lines for tickets

of Texas.

Tickets are required to attend the speech. They will be available at noon today at the ticket windows of Snyder Family Stadium, according to a release from K-State Media Relations and Marketing. Students should go to the ticket windows on the east side, and faculty and staff should go to the west side.

Charlie Thomas, director of Bramlage, said the facility had received a large volume of calls about the lecture. He said he expected people to begin lining up at 6 a.m.

Tickets are available for free on a first-come, first-served basis, the release said. Tickets are for reserved seats, so people who want to sit together must get their tickets together.

Individuals may get only one ticket and must present their K-State IDs both when getting a ticket and again to get into the lecture, according to the release. K-State-Salina students may pick up tickets Friday in the dean's office.

Reagan said the exact number of tickets is not available, but there will be "in the neighborhood" of 6,000 tickets for students and 1,500 tickets for faculty and staff. He said tickets will be split between the Manhattan and Salina campuses proportionally.

Several dignitaries, including members of the Kansas Board of Regents and Kansas legislators, will have reserved seats in the audience.

Kansas Governor Kathleen Sebelius will attend the lecture, said Megan Ingmire, assistant press secretary to the governor.

About 1,000 soldiers from Fort Riley, Kan., will be in the audience, Reagan said. No tickets have been set aside for Manhattan residents.

"We have to remember what our business is, and our business is students," he said.

Reagan said the White House confirmed last week that Bush would be at K-State for the lecture on the selected date, but did not allow him to release the news until Wednesday.

Reagan said Bush was first invited after he had been elected governor of Texas, and the invitation was renewed several times, including when Bush was elected president.

The lecture will bring an end to years of work by many, including Sen. Pat Roberts, R-Kan., to bring Bush to speak in the series.

"We've had him invited for a long time, and I think Sen. Roberts was able to get our invitation on the table," Reagan said.

Bush's lecture.

"I think a lot of people will go regardless of their political views," Mausolf, senior in political science, said. "It says a lot for our university, especially the Landon Lecture Series."

Clint Westgate, president of College Republicans, said the group will try to get tickets for as many members as possible.

Westgate, senior in political science, said he would like to hear Bush address the United States' plan of action in Iran.

Ben Davis, publications chairman for College Republicans, said he also would like to hear Bush speak on Iran, Iraq and the economy.

"I think it'd also be a good idea for him to start reviving the Social Security platform again," Davis, junior in political science, said. "I hope he goes after it again this year."

Smith said he wants Bush to touch on Iraq, the global war on terror, bioterrorism and recent scandals involving Washington, D.C., lobbyists.

"I don't really expect him to go too far outside his usual talking points," Smith said.

Johnnie Parker, senior in pre-professional secondary education, said he wants Bush to talk about issues in the Middle East because Parker recently served there with the U.S. military.

Eric Spiess, freshman in music education, said he will not attend the lecture.

"I feel that it's both very informational as well as controversial," he said. "There are a lot of people who disagree with his views and his policy-making."

"But at the same time, he is our president, so he deserves our attention and gratitude."

that 94 percent either are employed, enrolled in graduate school or plan to enroll.

Although CES does not have immediate data upon graduation, according to the National Association of Colleges and Employers, 70 percent of college students graduate with a job.

In addition to an already positive market, the beginning of the baby boomers' retirement will create new vacancies, especially in non-profit and government sectors, which students often overlook, Keller said.

Michael Oldfather, associate professor of economics, said he, too, believed the future looks bright.

"Most of the reports I've seen are fairly encouraging, probably at least as good as last year, maybe slightly better," he said.

K-State alumnus dies in car accident

By Alex Peak

A memorial for John Lugo will take place at 4 p.m. Saturday at Junction City High School.

Lugo, spring 2005 K-State alumnus in finance, died Dec. 4 in a car accident in Florida.

After the service there will be a silent auction from 7 to 9 p.m. at the Elks Lodge. The proceeds will go toward a memorial fund for Lugo.

"There will be everything from signed Bill Snyder footballs to gift certificates at the auction," said Melissa Field, a friend of Lugo's.

Tito Lugo, John's brother, said John was living in Florida after receiving a job there. Tito also said he and his brother have a lot of family in Florida.

"He was always happy and outgoing," Tito said. "He loved athletics and he was great in competing at sports. His softball and flag football teams won all university intramural championships last year."

Tito said he would like to invite everyone to the memorial, especially those who knew his brother, John.

John was born Sept. 7, 1980, in Florida.

Telefund 2006 sets high goals

By Kelsey Noel
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Telefund 2006, known for being the world's largest all-volunteer telephone campaign for higher education, will begin Sunday.

The theme chosen for Telefund 2006 is CSI: K-State. CSI, in this case, stands for "call someone important." These important people are K-State alumni.

Gordon Dowell, KSU Foundation director of annual giving, said last year, about 30 percent of alumni pledged a donation to Telefund.

"We have the highest alumni participation rate in the Big 12 Conference," Dowell said.

Last year's Telefund efforts raised more than $1.3 million, he said.

For CSI: K-State, Dowell said the goals have been set even higher.

"We're hoping for pledges to reach $1.4 million and for participation from 1,600 volunteer student callers and 22,000 donors," Dowell said.

Since Telefund 2006 is run primarily by volunteers, even more funds go straight to the colleges, he said.

Landon Lecture hopefuls brave Kansas cold hours before box office opens

By Jonas Hogg
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The scene at Snyder Family Stadium on Thursday made it clear — a few people know who President George W. Bush is.

K-State blankets mingled with tents and sleeping bags as students tried to keep out of the Kansas wind. Footballs, lacrosse balls and frisbees made the trek back and forth across the parking lot, while the intended recipients took care to avoid pizza boxes and coffee cups abandoned by their owners.

Those with the presence of mind to bring heating huddled around grills.

The line horseshoed around the east stadium parking lot and continued into Kimball Avenue.

Even those who make a living on big events were a taken aback by the numbers.

"I have never, in my almost 20 years here, seen anything like that ... we may have set a record for the longest line," Charlie Thomas, director of Bramlage Coliseum, said.

Those in the front of the line move forward enough to see the rest playing catch-up, making the line contract like a spring-loaded accordion.

Professors vary on cancellation policies

By Adam Monroe
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

With several thousand students planning to attend President George W. Bush's lecture Monday, opinions have varied among faculty members on whether to cancel classes.

"Because of the limited space availability, we are not canceling classes that day," Provost M. Duane Nellis said in a memo issued to all faculty Thursday. "I ask that faculty make reasonable accommodations to students who have tickets to attend the Landon Lectures."

Bramlage Coliseum allotted 6,000 tickets for students to attend the lecture.

"This is the first time I have encountered a situation like this," Nellis said. "I hope faculty will be understanding of the learning potential of such a unique event."

There seems, however, to be little continuity among the actions of the K-State faculty.

Jiang Xin, associate professor of mechanical and nuclear engineering, will offer his lecture twice on Monday. His Mechanical Engineering Dynamics class will meet as scheduled from 12:30 to 1:20 p.m., but he also will offer this lecture again at 6 that evening.

"I think this is a rare opportunity and am willing to accommodate the students who want to partake in it."

Xin said.

However, he said he does not want to neglect either group of students.

"I feel that if I cancel class the students that didn't want to see the President's lecture would be upset, and since I didn't have time to take a survey, I felt this would be the best option," Xin said.

Faculty in the Department of Modern Languages took a different stand.

A memo which detailed the department's position was sent to all Spanish students.

"Absences on Thursday to get tickets and Monday for the actual lecture will not be considered excused absences," Spanish Coordinator Angeliq Courbou wrote in a memo to her students. "The department is striving to hold to its original attendance policies. We allow five unexcused absences a semester to be used for such unexpected events."

The number of unexcused absences varies between classes in the Modern Languages department.

"Allotted absences depends on the level. Some only allow three unexcused, while others allow more," said Lorena Barboza, director of the Language Learning Center.

Nellis said the decisions on excused or unexcused absences is up to the individual faculty members.

"I hope the faculty would be willing to provide an excused absence but I'm not directing them to" Nellis said. "It really depends on the circumstances."

Some professors said they chose to cancel classes to allow students to purchase tickets for the lecture.

"Several of our students had inquired about getting tickets and attending the event" said Alok Bhandari, associate professor of civil engineering. "We had been planning for a speaker, and I was worried about low attendance. Our class only meets for half of the semester and during the remainder students are doing their own projects. Since it's not a traditional class, it allows (for) some flexibility."

Speech security expected to be tight

Secret Service

The Secret Service is unique among law enforcement agencies because not only do they work criminal investigations, they also provide protection for the President and Vice President of the United States and their families, former Presidents, Presidential candidates, and visiting heads of state and heads of government to the United States.

The reason Secret Service agents wear sunglasses is to keep the sun out of their eyes so they can increase their ability to see what people in the crowd are doing.

For protective and investigative assignments, agents use their standard-issue weapon, handcuffs and radio to maintain contact with one another. They also are issued bullet-resistant vests.

Agents have a piece of equipment called a surveillance kit that is part of their radio. The surveillance kit contains a microphone and an earpiece that are connected to a radio.

Secret Service agents and officers carry the Sig Sauer P229, 357 caliber pistol. They also are trained on the Remington Model 870 shotgun, the Uzi submachine gun, and the MP5 automatic weapon.

The Secret Service uses canines from Holland called the Belgian Malinois. Dogs are taught basic obedience training, scent scouting, tracking (ground scent), article search, explosive odors detection, and patrolling (criminal apprehension).

Security officials are at work preparing Bramlage Coliseum for President Bush's Landon Lecture on Monday, especially in light of a new audiotape warning of plans for attacks against the United States.

CIA officials reported Thursday that they believe the voice on an audiotape threatening the U.S. is Osama bin Laden's. Charlie Thomas, director of Bramlage, said he went to several meetings Wednesday and Thursday to plan for the speech and said security at Bramlage would be "very, very tight."

Secret Service agents already are in Manhattan, said Special Agent Chuck Green, who is in charge of the agency's Kansas City, Mo., office.

Green said the agents had been in Manhattan "for some time now." He declined to confirm how many agents were in the area and said there would be more arriving with the president.

"We come with ... what we believe to be ample protection," Green said.

According to a news release from K-State Media Relations and Marketing, "handbags, backpacks, cameras, briefcases or bags of any kind" would not be allowed inside.

Green said cameras were banned because one could be used to conceal a threat.

"It slows things down tremendously when you have to check to see if they really are working cameras," he said.

Several area groups opposed to the Bush administration's policies on issues such as abortion and same-sex marriage are reportedly considering protesting the lecture. If they do, the Secret Service will decide how close demonstrators will be able to get to Bramlage.

The Secret Service is working with several local law enforcement agencies, including the Riley County Police Department and K-State Police. Representatives from both police departments declined to comment on security issues for the lecture at the Secret Service's request.

However, Capt. Richard Herrman of the K-State Police, said no roads would be closed.

Tickets to the lecture were distributed to students, faculty and staff at the Manhattan campus Thursday and will be handed out at the dean's office today at K-State-Salina. Attendees will have to present their K-State ID and ticket to get in.

Green said attendees will have to go through a metal detector to get through security.

Charles Reagan, chairman of the Landon Lecture Series, said the security measures won't be too difficult for students to go through.

"It's no more than getting on an airplane," he said. "It's less, actually. They won't be making people take off their shoes."

Threat level unchanged after new bin Laden tape

By Lara Jakes Jordan
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON, D.C. — The United States has no plans to raise the security threat level because of a new tape of Osama bin Laden saying al-Qaeda is planning attacks, counterterrorism officials said Thursday.

The White House firmly rejected bin Laden's suggestion of a negotiated truce. "We don't negotiate with terrorists," Vice President Dick Cheney said in a television interview. "I think you have to destroy them."

Counterterrorism officials said they have seen no specific or credible intelligence to indicate an upcoming al-Qaeda attack on the United States. Nor have they noticed an uptick in terrorist communications "chatter," although that can dramatically increase or decrease immediately before an attack.

The audiotape, released by the Arab television network Al-Jazeera, brought new attention to the al-Qaeda leader after a yearlong lull in his public statements.

The Homeland Security Department said it would not raise the national threat alert at this time. But the tape prompted increased security at Los Angeles International Airport and other precautions at the city's port, water and power facilities.

"At this time, we lack corroborating information suggesting that al-Qaeda is prepared to attack the United States in the near term," said Homeland Security spokeswoman Michelle Petrovich, "but we recognize that al-Qaeda remains committed to striking the homeland."

The national terror threat level currently stands at yellow, the middle of five grades, signifying an elevated risk of attack. The government has raised the alert level to orange, signaling a high threat risk, seven times since the attacks of Sept. 11, 2001.

The tape, which Al-Jazeera said was recorded this month, represents bin Laden's first public communication since December 2004. Since then, al-Qaeda's No. 2 leader, Ayman al-Zawahiri, has served as the terror network's public face.

The recording was released only days after U.S. missile attacks in Pakistan that Pakistani officials said killed four senior al-Qaeda operatives.

CIA analysts verified the recording as bin Laden's voice. They offered no details about how they reached that conclusion, but in the past the agency has verified authenticity in part by comparing new recordings to earlier messages.

Cheney said the tape showed that al-Qaeda has been hobbled, because "they didn't have the ability to do anything on video" and because it had been so long since bin Laden had been heard from. However, he said the threat from al-Qaeda continues, noting "ample evidence of continued plotting against the United States."

"I think we have to assume that the threat is going to continue for a considerable period of time," Cheney said in an interview with Fox News Channel. "Even if bin Laden were no longer to be a factor, I still think we'd have problems with al-Qaeda."

In Los Angeles, Mayor Antonio Villaraigosa said city police deployed additional resources at their airport and "posted signage indicating that bomb sniffing dogs and searches will occur frequently." He described the measures as precautionary, as there were no known threats to the city. The Port of Los Angeles and the Department of Water and Power also planned to take precautionary measures, according to Villaraigosa's statement.

Sharon Gang, a spokeswoman for District of Columbia Mayor Anthony A. Williams, said the capital was not raising its terror alert level. In Virginia, the information did not trigger any alarms, said Steve Mondul, the state's deputy preparedness director.

Manhattan residents excluded from lecture

Luann Cramer was prepared to stand in line for tickets to see President George W. Bush.

Cramer, 75, said she and her husband Gordon were disappointed to find out the president's Landon Lecture scheduled for Monday was limited to K-State students, faculty and Fort Riley military personnel.

"I can see why it was just for students, because he's coming to the university," said Luann, who attended K-State from 1949 to 1952. "It is an educational opportunity for the students."

Charles Reagan, chair of the Landon Lecture series, said Bush's lecture is limited to K-State students and faculty, as well as Landon patrons.

"It's a university event, even though it's important to the state and community," Reagan said. "The students and faculty are a part of the community."

According to the Landon Lecture Web site, lectures usually are attended by K-State students, faculty and alumni, as well as the general public. The lecture series is sponsored by approximately 400 patrons, who pay a membership fee of $150 per year.

Reagan said the general public can view the lecture live from the Landon Lecture Web site. Residents also should call Cox Communications to see if the lecture will be broadcast on any channel, he said.

City clerk Gary Fees said he thinks Bush's visit will give exposure to K-State and the surrounding community.

"It will bring some publicity to Kansas State University and to the city of Manhattan," Fees said.

Mayor Pro Tem Bruce Snead said he would prefer if the general public were able to attend the lecture.

"The president is the president of all of us," Snead said. "I think it would be appropriate for the community to attend in some numbers."

Charlotte Edelman, Manhattan resident, said she was surprised the lecture was not opened to the general public.

"In the past, it has always been open to the community," she said.

Edelman, who has lived in Manhattan for 39 years, said she attended then-President Richard Nixon's Landon Lecture in 1970, as well as then-President Ronald Reagan's lecture in 1982.

"Bush's lecture is something of interest regardless of one's political affiliations," she said. "It is not a partisan issue but rather something of historic interest."

TO THE POINT Tickets belong only to K-State students, faculty

Seeing the President of the United States in person is a wondrous occasion. It will be a story those in attendance can tell their friends and family for the duration of their life. One of those moments where everything else in the world disappears for a brief period of time.

On Monday, if the citizens of Manhattan want this opportunity, they have to be content to watch it on TV or listen to it on the radio. This Landon Lecture is for students faculty and staff only, and that's the way it should be.

We all have put a lot of money, time and effort into making K-State what it is today, and we deserve this right. Although we owe a lot to the city of Manhattan, they in turn owe a lot to us. This is not selfish of us. We are the people for whom this lecture was created.

Sure, if we had failed to sell out at the box office, it would have been a polite gesture to offer residents the opportunity to take their place beside us listening to the president's speech.

The tickets did sell out, though, and there just isn't enough room for the rest of the public.

There will be other university events in our future. Some may be better and some may be worse. As long as there's room for the general public, we should extend an invitation.

In cases like next Monday, though, we need to think of ourselves.

To the point is an editorial selected and debated by the editorial board and written after a majority opinion is formed. This is the Collegian's official opinion.

Entering the real world Steady job not the only road to independence

I don't know how many times in my collegiate life people have asked me the reason I am going to school.

As I've entered my last year of college I've noticed people now have a follow-up question to that one.

That is, "So what do you want to do with that?"

I tell them, "I don't know, maybe nothing."

Their response is usually "oh, I see," but the verbalized reaction often is accompanied by an ostentatious stare.

In my mind I hear them saying things like: "Aren't you wasting your time here?" "You're a spoiled money pit," "You don't have direction; you're a failure waiting to happen," "I don't like your shirt" (The last one was an especially haughty person).

This didn't bother me at first when fellow students asked me. I felt they might be able to relate to me. But when I went to go get my hair cut a few weeks ago, I found myself irritated by the lady when she followed the question protocol.

She asked me if I had any interviews yet. I told her no and she said, "You better get on that. You have to have a plan."

I was left thinking, "I came here for a three faded to an inch, not career counseling, right?"

So here it is, something that one of my teachers aptly labeled "the quarter-life crisis."

In a recent conversation I had with my parents over winter break, I confessed I was not ready for the "real world."

To walk into a building and greet one of my coworkers with a, "Hey Jim, how's the wife and kids?" seems to somehow endanger the integrity of my soul.

I expected my parents to be disappointed, but I was surprised by their answer.

They told me the real world is not synonymous with career.

All it is, is independence.

The ability to pay bills myself, the ability to say, "I think I want to live in Utah for two years," and then do it. (Utah was my parents' example, not mine).

CODY HOLUB

So, although I might not even pursue my chosen field of academic study, I have come to the conclusion that college has not been a waste of time for me.

It has given me time to think.

In fact, it reminds me of a time I went to a restaurant by myself. I sat down and perused the menu.

I narrowed the options down to a few selections. Then, the server came up to me and asked, "What'll it be?"

I said, "You know, on any ordinary day, any number of these courses could fill me up satisfactorily so that I would no longer be hungry. But I have a feeling, and the desire, that today is not to be ordinary."

The server said, somewhat confused, "oh, I see." I then got up and left that place hungry for something extraordinary.

Designer jeans empty pockets but raise status

I'm ashamed to admit I have blown my entire paycheck on a single item of clothing.

Not just any item of clothing, mind you, but a pair of True Religion jeans for which I had been pining for since I heard them scream my name from the rack.

The framed picture of them I held next to my heart while I slept was attracting too much attention from my roommates, so the next logical step was to purchase them.

However, this, too, held its obstacles.

For one, I had no source of employment.

So I decided I needed a job. I searched long and hard, let down countless employers eager to hire someone with my caliber of skills and finally settled on a job at Arby's.

Quickly, I found the fast food industry wasn't exactly my bag. For an entire two weeks.

Just long enough to earn a large portion of the money needed for my awaiting True Religion jeans.

I fear that I have fallen prey to a disastrous trend sweeping our society. No longer are we satisfied with clothes that simply look good and cover flab, but they have to scream "I have money!" as well.

Don't misunderstand me.

If you are one of the fortunate few who lead a budgetless life and choose to spend your hard-earned money on Louis Vuitton bags or Marc Jacobs shoes, then kudos to you. I'll affix my jealous eyes on them from afar.

My problem is with people like myself, who spend large chunks of money that they barely have on items they're almost too nervous to use, in order to keep them in mint condition.

It's hard to believe that these type of purchases have much to do with anything other than status.

In my case, I am fairly certain that when I decided to buy the aforementioned jeans, I didn't think to myself, "Hm...they seem to have increased durability and thread breathability than jeans of a lesser price."

No, I bought them because the label said 'True Religion', and the fact that I owned them indicated I had money. This was not true, especially since I had to find employment simply to fund my taste.

What's distressing is that a majority of these items have much cheaper counterparts.

For instance, I have a bag that I bought at Target for approximately $20 that looks semi-identical to a Chanel purse I saw on the Internet.

An obvious effect of buying these cheaper versions would be the fact that you can buy more of them.

Once I bought my jeans, I had problems purchasing other things such as food. With a little more frugal spending, I could perhaps have bought a different brand of jeans, and then not counted pennies under my car seats to buy McDonald's.

There's nothing wrong with designer clothes.

I like them, save for them, and occasionally trick my conscience into buying them.

It's fun, I'll admit, regardless of how unintelligent a decision it may be.

MEGAN MOLITOR

However, I worry that part of the "fun" is thinking of how what you wear will appear to others.

The worst part of my experience?

The jeans went on sale the week after I bought them.

TO THE EDITOR

Young minds need to learn evolution, intelligent design

Editor,

Both evolution and intelligent design are theoretical explanations for the existence of living things. They are the most plausible explanations for the existence of life. The real question should be which theory best explains what we observe and is most consistent with the results of experimental investigation.

We know from a few thousand years of observation that natural selection can alter the incidence of certain characteristics, but has not produced any new species. Nor has anyone observed a living thing being spontaneously generated from non-living matter. Based on observation, we should conclude that life cannot emerge from non-living matter and new species cannot evolve.

Consider Louis Pasteur, who virtually invented the field of microbiology. In Pasteur's day most scientists believed living bacteria were spontaneously generated within milk and fermenting wine. This belief was supported by Darwin's then-"new" theory.

Pasteur endured years of scorn from the scientific community until the proof of his germ theory was so overwhelming that it could no longer be denied. Narrow-minded "scientists" today would not only resurrect Pasteur's opponents claiming the reality of spontaneous generation, but they would give them the only keys to the academy and raise the drawbridge to prevent the consideration of what Pasteur proved.

Right now we are teaching young people what to think, not how to think. There are good arguments to be made for each theory of origins. Why not present the arguments for each and let young minds grapple with the issue?

Columnist's work reveals ego, pretentious opinions

Editor,

It was disheartening to read Kody Cooper's pretentious opinion piece, Supreme Importance, in Wednesday's Collegian. The byline reads that Cooper "is a senior in political science and Spanish," and invites the reader's comments. Here are mine.

Clearly, the political science faculty can take little pride in this product. The style and substance of this student's thinking are indistinguishable from those of Pat Robertson. And like the Rev. Robertson, political scientist Cooper is terribly full of himself.

At first I thought Cooper's diatribe must be an April Fool piece, but - alas - it was dated Jan. 18. His use of the term "mental disorder" (which he uses twice) along with the words "mentally disordered," "schizophrenia," "schizophrenic," and "schizo" (each of which appears once) to refer to opinions of which he disapproves is inappropriate and it perpetuates an abusive stereotype.

Cooper's sophomoric, snotty and sarcastic sentences (this is payback for his own atrocious alliterations) provide scant cover for his vacuous argument. His predilection for the useless adjectives "hard-left," "lefty," "leftist" and "left" overwhelm any meager meaning in his text.

Cooper's own inflated "hard-right" mindset carries a far less hopeful prognosis than that of the clients in any mental health practice.

To Spanish-major Cooper, I say, "¡lárgate!"

Columnist's North Korea piece lacks research

Editor,

In spite of being a senior in print journalism, Zachary Eckels doesn't seem to want to engage in any journalistic research. His opinion of Jan. 19 assigns superior humanitarian qualities to the regime in North Korea.

Before he does this he might want to do a Google search on the name Arthur Bonifas, or find a visible light satellite photo of the Korean Peninsula and figure out its significance. Or maybe do a year-by-year analysis of the number of people attempting to escape from North Korea and compare that to the number of people attempting to escape to North Korea.

Events such as these give a better insight to the character of that regime.

Additionally, where is Eckels' research on the funding of actions that have "been spent on improving people's living conditions" in Iraq? Does he know how many schools have been built? How many hospitals rehabilitated? Children brought to the United States for medical treatment unavailable in Iraq? Megawatts of power generated in 2005 compared with 2003?

I think not. Until he does some research and can back up his opinions with some facts, you should not let him open his mouth in public. Opinion disconnected from fact and not in agreement with ground truth is what gives seniors in print journalism a bad name.

Americans deserve to make own decisions on abortion

Editor,

With Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr. now leading the Supreme Court and Judge Samuel Alito soon to be confirmed, many Americans have wondered, "What if Roe v. Wade was overturned?" Some people have claimed that overturning Roe would ban abortion nationwide. Don't believe it for a second - they don't know what they're talking about.

Before Roe was ruled in 1973, abortion was an issue for the individual states: four states had abortion on demand, and most other states had women's health or deformity exceptions to abortion restrictions.

If the citizens of Kansas wanted to restrict abortion, while the people of Missouri wanted to allow abortion, then the Kansas and Missouri legislatures acted accordingly.

In Roe, seven justices hijacked our democracy, replacing the will of the people (as embodied in the legislative process of individual states) with their judicial will (an undemocratic power grab that invaded women's privacy).

Since the Constitution doesn't address abortion, state legislatures, not the Supreme Court, should decide it.

In Planned Parenthood v. Casey (1992), the court said states could restrict abortion if they didn't impose an "undue burden" on a woman's right to abortion. Balancing women's rights and a culture of life remains difficult, but it would be easier if we the people had a chance to decide the issue the right way: democratically.

If Roe is overturned, and it probably will be, we the people will get to make our own choices about abortion, instead of someone in Washington.

Feminism means equal rights, not man-hating

Editor,

The definition of feminism according to the dictionary is: belief in the social, political, and economic equality of the sexes.

When Kelsey Childress says, "Women who attempt to bring attention to these injustices are labeled feminists, stereotyped, and their ideas are disregarded by society," I would hope the women in question would be called feminists, because that is what they are.

Any person who believes in equal rights for women and men is a feminist. Feminism is not about burning bras, being a lesbian, man-bashing, man-hating, butch women or better rights. It is about equal rights for women and men under the law, nothing more, and nothing less.

Before people start making judgment calls, making assumptions or calling people names, maybe they should do a little research as it appears Childress did not.

President's visit no honor to K-State, community

Editor,

The first words from the introduction to George W. Bush will be "What an honor it is to have you speak at Kansas State!" That's the galling part. He only speaks to friendly, often hand-picked, audiences where he can expect uncritical agreement.

In 1999, Bush was asked to name something at which he wasn't proficient. He replied, "Sitting down and reading a 500-page book on public policy or philosophy or something." Bush has neither the intellect nor inclination to design public policy.

He is a figurehead to take the heat for the Vice President's inner circle who develop administration initiatives.

But George is not a harmless buffoon. The few initiatives like "No Child Left Behind," which got off the ground, are now recognized as bad policy.

Even this catastrophic war ($234,784,893,000 as of Jan. 19, 2006) is not as expensive as his administration's give-away to his wealthiest patrons.

The New York Times, the Los Angeles Times, ABC News and NBC News all reported that 42.6 percent of his $1.6 trillion tax cuts will end up in the pockets of the richest 1%. While Bush might tell us that his elimination of the "Death Tax" will save Kansas family farms, farm-industry experts for the New York Times could not point to a single case of a family losing a farm because of estate taxes. This cut is designed for the top two percent. The legislation he signs have hollowed out the American middle class... his audience at Bramlage. For us, this visit is no honor.

Torture policy separates U.S. from its own enemies

Editor,

I am terribly disappointed by the simplistic editorial offered by Jonas Hogg on the issue of torture. Mr. Hogg, the "feel-good crap" you so adamantly oppose in the McCain bill is essentially what separates us from enemies in our past, and the brutal enemy we today encounter.

From April 21 to Aug. 12, 1949, the civilized nations of our planet sought to counteract the horrific circumstances faced by captives of war.

This, Mr. Hogg, is what is known as the fourth Geneva Convention - where a series of guidelines regarding prisoner treatment was established by non-fanatical, non-facist, thinking human beings.

In these days of cultural conflict here in the United States, many tell those against the war that if they don't like it - leave! Well, if you don't support the notion of honorable behavior in times of war, you're not supporting the American ideology that has set us apart for years.

The K-State women's basketball team's first Big 12 Conference road win over Oklahoma State on Wednesday gave the team more than just a tally in the win column. The 67-57 victory gave the team momentum heading to Texas for the Wildcats' second consecutive road game of the week on Sunday.

"Getting that first road win is a huge stepping stone for us because it gives us confidence going into Texas, knowing that we can win on the road," freshman guard Shalee Lehning said. "Texas is going to be a tough atmosphere to play in, but we are ready for it."

The Wildcats (13-3, 3-2) face a Longhorn (9-6, 3-2) team that is coming off their third consecutive conference win after dropping their first two conference games.

"They're going to be at home, so they are going to be really hyped," junior forward Claire Coggins said. "It's just

Chiefs' Al Saunders

Redskins coach Joe Gibbs upgraded his offense Thursday by adding one of the brightest offensive minds to his sidelines.

Gibbs hired Chiefs offensive coordinator Al Saunders as assistant head coach and offensive coordinator, convincing him to sign a three-year contract worth more than $2 million a year. Saunders was considered the leading candidate for the Raiders head coaching job after their first set of three interviews but he had not been offered the job.

With only two head coaching opportunities left — Oakland and Buffalo — Saunders was fielding a lot of phone calls by teams and coaches who wanted him as their offensive coordinator. The biggest surprise was the arrival of Gibbs in Kansas City on Wednesday.

Johnson as Chiefs' RB

Larry Johnson will be the Kansas City Chiefs starting running back next season, regardless of Priest Holmes' health.

Johnson said new coach Herman Edwards gave him the role during their first meeting Tuesday.

Johnson finished the season with nine straight 100-yard games, 1,750 yards and 20 touchdowns (plus one receiving) after Holmes was put on the disabled list Nov. 9 with head and neck trauma.

An assault case against Johnson was dismissed on Wednesday.

The charge stemmed from an alleged altercation Sept. 10 in which an Overland Park, Kan., woman claimed Johnson shoved her at a Kansas City bar.

Kansas City Chiefs defensive back Greg Wesley was arrested early Thursday for allegedly threatening to punch a bouncer.

Police said Wesley had been banned from entering Blonde, a bar on the city's Country Club Plaza. At about 12:30 a.m., the 27-year-old player tried to enter the bar, according to a police report.

When bouncer Andrew Lord refused to let him in, police said Wesley lunged at the bouncer with his fist in the air.

Wesley posted $500 bond Thursday morning. His municipal court date was set for May 2.

Jessica Simosa still has a few things to take care of before the season is over.

Simosa, a senior, has posted at least 17 wins her freshman year, 19 her sophomore year and 21 last season. She also has ascended to the No. 1 singles spot on the K-State women's tennis team.

She said she is still hoping for a strong finish to her career, so she said she is hoping for the K-State career-singles wins record. Simosa currently has 66 wins, and former Wildcat Maria Rosenberg leads K-State with 79 career victories.

Simosa also said she wants to lead the Wildcats back to the NCAA tournament for the first time since 2003, she said.

"My goal is to be the all-time career singles wins leader at the end of the year," Simosa said. "My other goal is to make it to nationals."

Coach Steve Bietau said he thinks Simosa has had a career full of ups and downs. He said he's proud of the way she has been able to steady out her play this fall.

"She's been part of a lot of things here," Bietau said. "Her individual play has been brilliant and disappointing at times. Traditionally, she's always done much better in the spring than in the fall, but this fall she was very steady, so I'm excited about what she can do this spring."

The women's tennis team will start the spring season Friday with the Georgia Bulldog Invitational in Athens, Ga. The tournament features a four-team field with a mock duel format. Georgia, Mississippi State and Troy are the other schools making up the quad.

The team worked for four to five hours a day when they came back from winter break. The focus of the early practices was primarily on conditioning, Bietau said.

"The biggest concern for me is that they come back in shape and physically ready to start working really hard on the courts," Bietau said. "Roughly speaking, you can get your timing back in a couple of weeks."

Bietau said he likes the level of competition his team will see at this tournament. Georgia will have a couple of women ranked high nationally and the team usually is one of the top programs in the country, he said.

Honeymoon supersedes K-State-Kansas game

The last time I wrote a column for the Collegian I was "single," though I'd been off the market for more than five years.

In addition, Tom Brady had yet to lose a National Football League play-off game, the University of Texas was college football's second-best team, and the K-State men's basketball team hadn't defeated Kansas since Jan. 17, 1994.

A lot has changed in the past month.

As you surely have heard, the often exciting but always erratic K-State men's basketball team impressively ended "the streak" in Lawrence last Saturday, and followed the performance with a 58-54 win over Texas A&M on Wednesday.

Allow me to digress for a moment.

My beautiful bride and I spent last week on our honeymoon in Cabo San Lucas, Mexico, where the sun shines 360 days a year and sea lions can be heard barking from outside Oprah Winfrey's penthouse.

While I was basking (more like burning) in the sun, K-State was preparing to go into Allen Fieldhouse and knock off a hot Kansas team that had handed K-State 31-straight losses.

Call me an optimist, but I honestly thought the Wildcats had a fairly good chance to win that game. Then again, I also thought K-State would beat Nebraska at Bramlage Coliseum and the Kansas City Chiefs would make the playoffs.

I had a dilemma because my wife and I were scheduled to fly back from our honeymoon the same day K-State played Kansas, and I could've covered the game. By doing so, I would have sat on the floor at Allen Fieldhouse and, better yet, had a chance to personally witness one of K-State's biggest wins of the last decade.

Here were my two options: A. Skip the game and spend one more night in Cabo, or B. Ask my wife if

Men's team to take on conference rivals in KSU-KU-MU Triangular

By Chris Carpenter
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

All this week the scuttlebutt has been about K-State's men's basketball victory against Kansas.

This weekend, another team will get a chance to knock off the Jayhawks, as the K-State track and field squad will go head-to-head against Kansas and Missouri in the KSU-KU-MU Triangular in Lawrence.

"This is a very unique meet," Coach Cliff Rovelto said. "We started it in 1990, and it's a very interesting concept because in this day and age, you don't see traditional rivals get together very often, and when they do, it's kind of a big deal."

One unique factor to the Triangular is that men's and women's points are combined to produce one winning school, not separate crowns for men and women.

"Sometimes you might have your men win and your women lose," Rovelto said. "This really gives you some freedom with your athletes."

The Wildcats have won 14 of the 16 meets dating back to 1990. The winning team takes away a trophy in "The Jug," which K-State has taken home the last seven years in a row.

"The record we enjoy really shows the completeness of our program," Rovelto said. "While there have been times the other two programs haven't been at our level, some of our victories have come when KU and MU have had very good teams."

With his team debuting in the Trackwire.com Top 25, it appears K-State should get its eighth-straight victory in the series.

What's your flavor?

From Leaping Lemon to Purple Pride, local ice cream shops give the scoop on frozen favorites

By Sheila Ellis
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Wild Thing, Espresso Ecstasy, Leaping Lemon, Apple Dapple, Purple Pride and Cotton Candy Confetti are just some of the names of the ice cream flavors that students can get at the Call Hall ice cream shop.

"The most popular flavors here are anything with cheesecake, Espresso Ecstasy, vanilla, strawberry and chocolate," said Scout Vanier, junior in human ecology and clerk at the ice cream shop.

Not many students know how much decision-making goes into creating the perfect ice cream flavor, Lori McVay, Call Hall plant manager, said.

McVay said she and the employees at Call get to come up with names and ideas of new flavors. The process after they pick the ice cream is finding a manufacturer to sell Call the ingredients, and then they make the flavor in bulk.

Many of the flavors are sold seasonally including, peach, pumpkin and egg nog ice cream.

Students have access to Call Hall ice cream in the K-State Student Union. The ice cream is made on campus in the Dairy Processing Plant all year round, she said.

Off campus, there also are other places in Manhattan where students can go to get ice cream, including Cold Stone Creamery, TCBY, Baskin Robbins, Dairy Queen and Shake's Frozen Custard.

At Shake's, students can find some crazy names, including Shake's Bopper, Pink Poodle and Bannadanna split.

Ryan Osbourne, director of marketing for Shake's, said Shake's starts out with a flavor they think their audience will enjoy, and then they go from there.

Most of their flavors are originated from rock oldies, to coincide with Shake's theme of a 1950s sock-hop.

"Shake, Rattle and Blow is one of the weirdest names we've come up with," Osbourne said.

The flavor was based from the flavor of bubble gum.

According to TCBY's Web site, some of their wacky flavors are Punchy Pineapple, Right-On Raspberry, Juicy Orange, Kiwi Berry Kick, Wondermelon, Sublime Lime and Tropical Citrus.

In local grocery stores, students can see other wacky flavors from brands like Ben and Jerry's Homemade Ice Cream.

According to their Web site, flavors that were introduced in 2005 were Dave Matthews' Band Magic Brownies, which is a vanilla ice cream with swirls of raspberry and brownies.

Other flavors introduced last year were Fossil Fuel - a sweet cream ice cream with chocolate cookie pieces, fudge dinosaurs and a fudge swirl - and Marsha Marshmallow - a chocolate ice cream with fudge chunks and toasted marshmallow and graham cracker swirls.

'Living Memory' kicks off performance series

By Lauren Rohrer
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

There were large scale lights, numerous props and extensive multimedia effects involved in "Living Memory," which played Thursday night in McCain Auditorium.

The first of this semester's performance series at McCain, "Living Memory" ran for less than an hour and featured all the technical elements in place for a lengthy, large-cast production, yet the show featured only one actress, - Lyne Rodier, of Montreal, Canada.

According to its Web site, "Living Memory" follows the memoirs of a woman who is 100 years old and nearing death. Although close to her own demise, she chooses to recall her life as her 20-year-old self, so the actress seen onstage is relatively young.

Through the technical elements used in the show, the woman experiences her life on stage. Rodier interacts with different toys from her youth and progresses to experience her more complicated adult life.

"Living Memory" is one of four shows touring in the United States and Canada from the production company "Les Deux Mondes," which means "The Two Worlds." According to its Web site, "Les Deux Mondes" is based in Montreal, Canada - home to most of the actors and technical directors involved.

As the featured performer, Rodier said she has had some experience with this production, as she has been acting with it for the last two years.

"With this production, you can see a show that nicely complements the actor, performance, technology and words," Rodier said.

Jason Pomrenski, backstage manager and one of the original developers of the production company, said he is responsible for the setup and operating of many of the lights and multi-media equipment. The show is operated with only three technicians - each focusing on lights, video or sound.

"The idea of this show is to be open-minded," Pomrenski said, "to view theater and just look and experience without having to ask so many questions."

Some students in attendance said they had difficulty understanding or appreciating the concepts the show conveyed.

"It was a bit too abstract, just a little too deep for my liking," said Molly Kuhlman, sophomore in bakery science and management.

Katie Kuhlman, junior in biology, said she thought the performance was unusual.

"I've never done LSD, but I would imagine that is what it would be like," she said.

"Brokeback Mountain"

Movie review by Amy Bolton

Brokeback Mountain, based on a short story by author E. Annie Proulx, is a deeply moving and heart-wrenching movie about two men whose lives are completely spun out of control when they discover their love for each other.

The movie is often referred to as the "gay cowboy" movie, but it is really just a story about two people in love.

When Ennis Del Mar (played by Heath Ledger, who gives an Oscar-worthy performance) and Jack Twist (Jake Gyllenhal) first meet in 1963, they are two ranch hands hired to spend the summer alone atop Brokeback Mountain, herding sheep.

Initially, the friendly and outgoing Jack has a hard time getting the deeply private and quiet Ennis to say more than a few words to him. But as the summer progresses, and they spend more time together, they develop a deep connection.

Both men are stunned and confused when their relationship turns physical, but they quickly realize they are unable to deny their feelings for each other.

As the summer draws to a close, the two men go their separate ways, unsure if they'll ever be together again.

Ledger's portrayal of Ennis is so powerful that it earned him a Golden Globe nomination.

The voice he gives Ennis conveys his shy personality and the insecurity he feels with himself.

So much attention is given to Ledger's performance that Jake Gyllenhal's is practically overlooked. While Ledger captures Ennis as a scared and confused young man, Gyllenhal grasps Jack's passion and never ending hope that eventually he and Ennis will be together.

This movie is not about cowboys or mountains, heterosexuality or homosexuality. It's simply a story about two people so in love that their lives are forever changed.

The emergency exit for Mosier Hall is closed for renovations until early May. The renovations on the new intensive care unit started Nov. 21.

Vet Med ICU renovations to provide added space

By Lacey D. Mackey
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Animals in critical condition will soon have more room after the completion of a new animal intensive care unit at the College of Veterinary Medicine's Mosier Hall.

Renovations started Nov. 21, and Laura Armbrust, project coordinator for the Veterinary Medicine Teaching Hospital, said the completion date is set for early May.

"For the students, it's a better facility for work, with more space and less crowding," Armbrust said. "It will also provide better storage, all in one area."

While the construction will soon come to an end, Armbrust said the facility and students have lost the use of the rooms in Mosier Hall during the renovations, and noise has also been an issue during classes. But Armbrust said the students have handled it excellently.

The renovations were paid for by multiple sources, but Armbrust said he was unable to give further detail on the number and background of donors.

Rose McMurphy, professor in the Department of Clinical Sciences, said the current ICU has limited work space for workers and patients.

Soon, McMurphy said there will be more space.

"It helps us provide a better level of care and a better work environment," she said.

The previous ICU held 16 to 17 animals, but after construction, space for 21 will be available, with better availability for large dogs.

A separate washtub area and storage area will be built to make the work environment more spacious. Even with the new renovations and resources, McMurphy said the price of care will remain unchanged.

"It will be the same standard of care for the same price," she said.

Patrice Scott, marketing and development officer at the hospital, said the renovations will affect 11 rooms, tripling the size of the unit.

"It's going to be a fantastic facility for students," Scott said. "Every test you would need could be done here. I think our capabilities, coupled with our technology and the specialists, that's a pretty powerful resource for any pet lover in the area."

Student exchange program available

By Ashleigh Williams
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

K-State now offers a way for students to study abroad without leaving the country.

The National Student Exchange program gives students the opportunity to study at one of 177 different universities around the country.

More than 80,000 students have participated, said Carolyn Comiskey, study abroad adviser in the department of International Programs.

"It began when a couple of administrators from state universities were talking and realized that many of their students didn't necessarily want to stay in-state for college, but choose to do so because it was the best deal financially," Comiskey said.

With this program, students pay for 15 credit hours of in-state tuition, regardless of their status at their home university, and also must have a 2.5 grade point average.

Another bonus to the program is that all the credits transfer back to the student's home university, so they do not fall behind.

"I heard about the program through a friend last year at Northern Arizona State University, and I knew right away

I had to take this opportunity to study at another university," Megan Daugherty, junior in pre-professional health, said.

While some students benefit financially, there are other reasons students take advantage of the program.

"Location, location, location," Kimya Cartledge, sophomore in mechanical engineering, said. "K-State was closer to Wichita than Iowa State, and I wanted to be closer to home."

Students who want to learn more about the program can attend one of the information sessions held at 4 p.m. on Mondays in Fairchild 304.

Employers, police joining Facebook

By Christina Hansen
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Potential employers are emerging as the latest group to join the popular collegiate Web site Facebook.com.

Founded in February 2004 by former Harvard student Mark Zuckerberg, the Facebook is an online network comprised of college students across the United States.

Members maintain personal profiles filled with content ranging from likes and dislikes to quotes and photos. Kerri Keller, director of Career and Employment Services, said many students do not realize their potential employers might be accessing their Facebook profiles before making hiring decisions.

"We don't see it a lot yet," she said, "but students should be aware that this can happen."

Keller said within CES, there has been some discussion and concern expressed about content posted online.

One employer told Keller he rejected several applicants for a teaching position after discovering drunken and revealing photos when he accessed their Facebook profiles.

"This is an issue of integrity, what kind of risk you might be putting your relationships at, including your professional relationships," she said.

Danielle Hammes, sophomore in pre-nursing, said she was surprised that employers would look up applicants' profiles before hiring them.

"I don't see why anything on the Facebook would be relevant to them," she said.

Rebecca Johnson, senior in marketing, however, said checking a student's information on the Facebook is no different than running a Google, or similar Internet search.

"If you put that information out there, it's not really an invasion of privacy," she said. "The information is there — it's not hidden from anybody."

A Jan. 8 article in The New York Times suggested law enforcement officials also may be using the Facebook database to keep up on student activities.

The article focused on student Kyle Stoneman, a senior at George Washington University in the District of Columbia.

Stoneman said that campus security officers used the popular Web site to locate and break up a party he was hosting at his home, citing under-age drinking.

A George Washington spokesperson told the Times that noise complaints, not Internet sleuthing, brought officers to the party, but acknowledged that two of the university's campus police officers are members on the Facebook.

Riley County Police Capt. Gary R. Grubbs, head of the criminal investigations unit, said he could neither confirm nor deny whether the RCPD uses the Facebook to monitor student activity.

"I am not at will to talk about any resources that could potentially be utilized in ongoing investigations," Grubbs said.

Liz Van Zant, senior in marketing, said she thought police use of the site was a bit deceptive.

"I never would have thought about law enforcement officials using the Facebook to monitor under-age drinking," she said. "The site is meant for college students."

Provost lecturer encourages more open communication

By Christina Hansen
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Open communication between advisers and students is crucial to academic success, speaker Blane Harding said at a Provost Lecture on Thursday.

As director of advising, recruitment and retention for the Colorado State University College of Liberal Arts, Harding was chosen to speak as part of the Provost's Lecture Series.

Harding said one of the most important issues facing universities is the increasing diversity on college campuses nationwide.

"Trust and credibility are important in adviser-student relationships," he said.

"Advisers need to ask questions to see what students consider to be their identity,"

Harding said students might identify themselves according to a number of factors, including ethnicity, race, sexual orientation and class.

He said it is important for faculty to get to know their students and avoid making assumptions about them based on appearance or background.

"We need to recognize the differences between individuals," Harding said. "Students have a variety of needs that must be met. In order to do so, we need to know students on the inside, not just the outside."

Self-education is the key, Harding said, for individuals to overcome their personal prejudices.

"We need to change our behavior, our procedures, in order to be truly advanced," he said.

"The more comfortable students are in our institutional structures, the better they'll do inside of those structures."

Ruth Dyer, associate provost, said although Harding's lecture focused on advising, his message was relevant across the entire K-State community.

"Success is grounded in the way you approach students," she said.

"Recognizing the individuality of each person — that's what will make you successful in personal interactions."

Alison Wheatley, assistant dean of the College of Arts and Sciences, said she appreciated Harding's emphasis on the importance of faculty-student interaction.

"Building relationships with our students is very important," she said.

"We're teaching students, dealing with students. We are not simply graduating numbers."

Legislature recommends education fund increase

By Kaley Lyon
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

A legislative audit released Monday recommended the state spend at least $316 million more on public education, annually.

"The number itself is questionable," said David Thompson, professor and department chair of educational leadership.

"It's expected to be a huge item of debate during the 2006 Kansas legislative session."

The specified amount of $316 million is a base figure, but the recommended amount of additional public education funding could exceed $399 million.

The reason for the different recommendations is that the study was based on input factors and output factors, said USD 383 Manhattan-Ogden Board of Education vice president David Colburn.

The study of input factors includes areas of public education that are mandated by the state, such as special education, and how much money such programs cost.

The outcome factors ask what it costs to have all students meet the standards set by the No Child Left Behind Act of 2001 and other performance standards, Colburn said.

If the state legislature, which resumed session Jan. 9, decides to apply the funding increase recommended in the audit, USD 383 could receive an additional $3 million to $4 million per year.

"Most likely, if we were to get the money, it wouldn't just come as money we could spend however we see fit," Colburn said. "We'll have strings attached."

It is possible the additional funding would contribute to helping at-risk students achieve, as well as developing all-day kindergarten classes, he said.

Also within the audit was a 99 percent assurance that there is a direct relationship between money spent and the outcomes a district produces.

"When you look at the top 10 states in terms of their performance, they're also the top 10 spenders," Colburn said.

"There's very strong correlation between the states that do the best and spending more money."

However, as the 2006 legislation is just getting started, there is still work to be done before the additional public school funding becomes a reality.

The legislative session is supposed to last 90 days, but it is unlikely that a total solution will come across in one legislative session, Thompson said.

"Will that settle the debate?" said USD 383 Superintendent Robert Shannon at Wednesday's Board of Education meeting. "I doubt it."

K-State grad opens Aggieville shop

By Abby Brownback
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Aggieville shopping options expand today.

Trendy with a Twist, 710 N. Manhattan Ave., a contemporary men's and women's clothing and accessories boutique, opens today.

The Florida-based company is owned by K-State graduate Tami Magocs and her husband John. The couple have four Trendy with a Twist stores in Florida and were looking to expand into other markets, Tami said.

"We thought Manhattan would be a good starting point for us because I'm familiar with the town," she said. "I'm just looking forward to actually working around young people."

John said they hope to add three more stores in the Kansas area in the next five years.

The store carries brands like Seven for all mankind, Lucky Brand and Lacoste. The denim sells for $70 to $280.

Tami said she is excited to have younger and more year-round business in Manhattan, instead of the seasonal business in Florida.

"We like to have fun," she said. "We're always in line with the latest fashions."

Cheryl Sieben, director of the Aggieville Business Association, said Trendy with a Twist will benefit Aggieville by giving consumers more options.

Cycling class gaining popularity

By Wendy Haun
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

A new style of workout program has been implemented at a local fitness center.

Mercy Fitness West, 315 Seth Child Rd., began an indoor cycling class in November after several members requested it, said Barbie Anderson, Fitness and Wellness coordinator for Mercy Fitness West.

"It's a very popular exercise funded through Mercy," she said.

Mercy Fitness West offers 11 classes a week, and there are 10 bikes for each class.

"We went through Schwinn and did a two-day training with certified instructors from Texas," Anderson said.

Membership to Mercy Fitness West is not required to attend the class, but it does provide a discount.

Anderson said the cycling class offers flexibility.

"Each person can control his or her own workout," she said. "The coach coaches the class, but each bike has a resistance knob so the person riding the bike can control how fast they pedal."

"It's a very personalized workout in a group setting."

Anderson said one of the main appeals of the program is the level of difficulty.

"You don't need to know a lot of fancy stuff, as if you were doing aerobics," she said. "It doesn't take a lot of coordination, and people are interested in it for that reason."

Amy Greene, senior in kinesiology, is a certified cycling coach for Mercy Fitness West. She was an intern at the hospital when she heard coaches were needed for the class.

"I just started teaching in September," she said. "I plan on continuing to teach, but I possibly want to go to nursing school."

Greene said the workout varies by class and one of the favorite routines is part of the Tour de France.

"A lot of people do it to music, and the song goes along with the workout," she said. "So if the beat picks up, the pace picks up."

Jessica Guy, Manhattan resident, said she has attended the cycling class since it started.

"It's something different," she said. "I don't get as bored."

Crystal Hensley, Manhattan resident and cycling coach, was the one who asked about starting a program.

She said she likes teaching the program because it is fun in a group.

"It's motivational with the music and to work with a group on one thing," she said.

Crisis Center Inc. receives 3 grants

By Holly Smith
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The Crisis Center Inc. was awarded $296,673 in grants this month to help victims of domestic violence and sexual assault.

The federal Stop Violence Against Women Act allocated the three grants to the Crisis Center Inc., 919 Humboldt St.

Judy Davis, executive director of the Crisis Center Inc., said she believes the funds will greatly benefit victims of abuse in the Manhattan area.

"The funds will help the Crisis Center get important services to victims more timely," Davis said.

According to a news release, the grants awarded to the Crisis Center Inc. were part of $1 million in grants awarded to more than 15 Kansas law enforcement agencies, prosecutors' offices, courts and victim service organizations.

These grants were awarded through the United States Department of Justice through the Office on Violence Against Women.

The Crisis Center has been in operation for 25 years and serves Clay, Geary, Marshall, Pottawatomie and Riley counties to provide services to victims of sexual and domestic violence.

All services are free and confidential.

Davis said the funds will support three separate projects: the Domestic Violence Task Force in Riley County, one in Geary County and a statewide 24-hour, toll-free crisis hotline for victims of domestic and sexual violence.

"We work together to figure out how we can better protect victims from criminal harm and how we can hold perpetrators accountable," Davis said.

The Domestic Violence Task Force puts specially trained civilian volunteers - called police response advocates - on the front lines of domestic abuse issues. After a Riley County or K-State police officer is dispatched to a domestic dispute, an advocate is notified and meets the police at the scene. This makes the advocate available if victims want to discuss resources and options available for them, Davis said.

The 24-hour, toll-free crisis hotline is a statewide service for victims of domestic and sexual violence.

"They can call and talk with someone with out the fear of being exposed and we do not tell them what to do," Davis said. "We listen, tell them what is available and offer ways we can help."

There also is a Manhattan hotline available 24 hours a day.

City Commissioner Tom Phillips said he is thankful the grants will allow the Crisis Center to continue helping victims of domestic and sexual abuse in Manhattan.

"I am very pleased the Crisis Center received the grant because they are such a valuable resource," Phillips said. "We are very fortunate to have their services."

Students in line for tickets to Monday's Landon Lecture turn the corner from out of the stadium parking lot onto Kimball Avenue on Thursday morning. Tickets were distributed at the Bramlage Coliseum ticket office and the line extended almost to the Peters Recreation Center.

in industrial engineering, along with others from Theta Xi, armed themselves with tents, sleeping bags, blankets, guitars, drums and even a board and washer set before setting out for the ticket line shortly before midnight Wednesday.

"We played until our hands got cold, which didn't take long," Beem said.

The Theta Xi group's plan to reach the ticket box first was unsuccessful.

"We had got up there to be first and we had a group of girls kind of butt us back," said Beem, who had to settle for seventh.

The first ticket went to Savvy Rogers, freshman in secondary education, who secured her position at 10 p.m. Wednesday.

Some came bearing food for their group.

Chris Swanson, junior in business, set up a grill in the back of his truck.

"Mainly just for me and some friends at first, and then after that I started meeting some people, making some friends," he said.

For the enterprising, the line was a money-making opportunity. Delivery drivers made their way through the crowd, and some entrepreneurs attempted to pad their wallets after securing their seats.

Patrick Attwater, freshman in accounting, waited 12 hours in line. After getting his ticket he returned with groceries and set up shop near the ticket booth.

"We sold so many burgers, people just kept coming up, so I decided I was going to cook some up ... and see if anybody else wants any," he said.

Despite the delivery drivers, crowd and random people throwing lassos, everything went well, Bramlage officials said.

"Everything went really smoothly," said Robin Fosha, director of ticket operations. "We knew it was going to be heavy."

All of the Manhattan campus's allotment of the approximately 6,000 student tickets ran out around 3 p.m., Fosha said, but everyone in the large line was able to get a seat.

The one difficulty to arise was a minor traffic jam in the parking lot and surrounding streets.

For those willing to brave the cold, the wait and the tempting smell of grilled burgers, the prospect of hearing the United States Commander-in-Chief speak was well worth the effort.

Mark Smelser, junior in park management conservation, received his tickets after two and a half hours.

"Now I can go get something to eat, get warm, and I'm excited to hear the president speak."

FUNDRAISER | Agriculture scholarships benefit from Telefund

"Most of the money each college receives goes toward student scholarships," Dowell said.

Students from each college at K-State can volunteer to help with Telefund by contacting the dean's office of the appropriate college.

While participating in the event, volunteers call people who graduated from the same college.

Throughout a volunteer's four-hour shift, there will be numerous opportunities to win their share of $100,000 worth of prizes, Dowell said.

Prizes offered include items such as coupons for free gasoline, t-shirts, mugs and food. The grand prize is the Teletruck, a black Nissan Frontier to be given away April 7 at the Kellogg's Telefund 2006 Grand Prize Bash.

CSI: K-State is made up of 22 nightly sessions that take place through Feb. 20. Each college has been assigned certain evenings during which to call.

"The College of Agriculture will have between 225 and 250 callers that will work," said Kevin Donnelly, assistant dean of the College of Agriculture.

The calling dates for the College of Agriculture are from Feb. 5 to 9.

Proceeds from Telefund will meet critical needs for students in the College of Agriculture by reserving about 60 percent of the money received for scholarships, Donnelly said.

"It's very essential to our scholarship program. Without it, we'd really be hurting," he said.

Phil White, junior in agricultural communications and journalism, said he was a volunteer caller his freshman year, and for the past two years he has been employed as the Foundation's student assistant.

Telefund provides a fun atmosphere for students who want to help raise money for their school, most of which help fund scholarships, White said.

"It's helping us help ourselves," he said.

Jackson. She is eighth in the conference in scoring, averaging 15.8 points per game, third in the conference in rebounding, averaging 10.8 rebounds per game and first in the conference in steals, averaging four steals per game.

Coach Deb Patterson said she might try to sneak extra players on the floor to stop Jackson.

"I was thinking that maybe we could put eight on the floor," Patterson said jokingly. "I think we just have to be true to our system and bring attention to who we are and what we need to do to be good."

Lehning said Jackson will be a focus of the Wildcat defense, but she won't be the only player the Wildcats will have to defend.

"Tiffany is a great player, but they have a lot of great players on that team, so you can't focus on one player," Lehning said. "We are all just going to have to bring our game and compete and pull our own load. We would like to stop Tiffany, but you can't just shut her down, you need to shut everybody else down."

Offensively, K-State faces a Longhorn defense that is sixth in the Big 12 in defensive scoring (59.4 points per game), third best in defensive rebounds (26.8 rebounds per game) and first in the conference in steals (11.2 steals per game).

"We just need to bring a huge focus to protecting the ball," Lehning said. "We need to communicate to each other, to let each other know where the defense is."

Patterson said the Oklahoma State win showed her team is ready to play in Austin, Texas.

MARRIAGE | Choice to return early from trip proves difficult she would consider switching our flight to Friday so I could go to the game.

Just a snapshot of the problems I'm faced with on a daily basis. I know. I have a rough life, despite growing up in Johnson County.

Being an avid sports fan, the choice was much harder than it should've been, but I opted to avoid the matter and miss the game for one more day of whale watching.

When our plane arrived in Dallas, I called my dad to find out who won. Upon hearing the news, I obviously felt mixed emotions knowing K-State won, and I couldn't go.

Luckily, my older brother TiVo'd the game for me.

As I watched it, I came realize to a few things: 1. Watching the first half was as hard as sitting through a calculus lecture, 2. Dramane Diarra can be more than just a defensive presence, and 3. I never should have considered coming back early from Cabo — not that my wife would've let me.

You see, my love of K-State sports — or shallowness, as some might call it — nearly destroyed my honeymoon, or at least spending another day of quality time with my wife.

There are, indeed, more important things in life than sports, and my relationship with my wife is certainly one of them.

Do I regret not coming back for the game?

Absolutely not. But I must admit part of me selfishly hoped K-State would wait to break "the streak" until they squared off in Manhattan.

MISSOURI | Tigers have won 6 of last 7 games after 4-4 start

Missouri is one of the teams that already has three wins in conference play.

After starting the season with a 4-4 record, the Tigers have won six of their last seven games. They are second in the Big 12 with a 3-1 record, having beat Oklahoma at home, and are now trailing only Texas at 3-0.

Missouri's last game was a thrilling 89-86 overtime victory against rival Kansas on Monday night. In that game, Gardner posted a career-high 40 points as he led his team back from a nine-point deficit with less than two minutes to play in regulation.

Coach Jim Wooldridge said he knows the game against Missouri will be tough.

"Outside of Texas, I don't know anybody playing any better than (Missouri)," Wooldridge said. "We'll have to really play well."

Last season, the Wildcats swept the season series against the Tigers, winning 74-54 in Manhattan and 63-53 in Columbia, Mo.

After posting a better overall record than Missouri, the Wildcats felt they were snubbed when the Tigers received an invitation to the NIT Tournament and K-State did not.

Harris, a Columbia, Mo., native, said the bitter ending to last season still bothers him.

"I keep that in the back of my mind, but we need to go out there and worry about what we're trying to get done on the court first," Harris said. "I think both teams are going to play hard. I know they have an edge on wanting to beat us this year because we're coming off the sweep last year."

As for whether it carries more weight to beat his hometown team, Harris didn't deny that he always gets up for games against Missouri.

"It always would mean a lot to me to beat Missouri, but I have to put that aside and concentrate on what we're trying to get done," he said.

One athlete helping K-State to national recognition this season is senior pole vaulter Breanna Eveland, who was awarded the Big 12 Conference Female Track and Field Athlete of the Week for her second-place finish at the Arkansas Invite with a vault of 13-9 1/4.

"Anytime you get an award like that, it justifies all the work you put in in the weight room and training," she said.

The jump ties Eveland's career best and puts her atop the 2006 Big 12 Performance list by nearly a foot.

Senior Christian Smith qualified provisionally for the NCAA Indoor Championships in the mile run with a time of 4 minutes, 25.8 seconds during his first mile of the indoor season, which is .16 seconds off the K-State indoor record.

Smith said he was happy with his effort.

"I was pleased to start off that well," he said. "Hopefully, I can get out and do a little bit better next time."

The team should perform at a high level as it takes on a pair of Big 12 and geographic rivals, Rovelto said.

"There's a definite pride factor involved," he said. "We take it seriously, and we have a certain expectation to win."

it sets the bar real high and allows them to see what the best teams look like," Bietau said. "At times you fall on your face in that situation, and there are times when we've gone into that situation and done very well."

Tamar Kvaratskhelia, 8-3 in the fall, said higher competition levels should help the team prepare for the spring.

"This tournament is a good idea by our coach to get us ready for our match play because last year we didn't do this, and we weren't really ready for our match play," Kvaratskhelia said.

Simosa said she understands that if she wants to achieve her goal of making it to nationals then, she has to be the one to lead the team.

"I need to do things right to set an example," Simosa said. "I'm really trying to take on a leadership role."

Bush to give lecture today

By Logan C. Adams
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

President George W. Bush presents the 142nd Landon Lecture at 11 a.m. today in Bramlage Coliseum.

Allen Abney, White House spokesman, said the speech's topic will be the War on Terror. He said this is the first time Bush has visited Kansas since May 17, 2004, when he spoke at the grand opening of the Brown v. Board of Education Historic Site in Topeka.

Bush
PRESIDENT

The administration has been rocked by controversial stories in the Washington Post and the New York Times claiming it had allowed federal agencies to use methods of fighting terrorism that may be unconstitutional.

Bush may use the lecture to fight back against his critics for his administration's actions in front of a relatively sympathetic crowd — Bush received 62 percent of the electoral vote in Kansas, according to www.cnn.com. He got 51 percent nationwide.

The Jan. 18 announcement left the campus buzzing over the news. Some professors

Seth Child road work continues on schedule

Construction workers are working on rock excavation for the east-bound off ramp from Kansas Highway 18 down to Seth Child Road and are finishing the second bridge.

The biggest changes in the roads include the removal of the loop ramp that existed to travel from eastbound Kansas Highway 18 on to Seth Child Road and the addition of a diamond interchange similar to the interchange on Interstate 70 at exit 303, said Kevin Schorzman, Wamego area engineer for the Kansas Department of Transportation.

The existing curve on Seth Child Road also will be removed, and the new road will go straight south to Allison Road.

In March, KDOT began road construction on and around Seth Child Road in an effort to bring roads up to current standards and replace the two bridges that carry eastbound and westbound K-18 traffic over Seth Child Road.

Jerry Haug, Wamego area Construction manager, said many of the changes will accommodate Vanier Complex gets $5.8 million facelift, adds facilities

By Ben Fallin
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

It's not close to football season, but that doesn't mean there isn't plenty going on at Snyder Family Stadium.

The stadium is getting a facelift this off-season that will include six phases and total $5.8 million, $4.3 million of which will go to phases four, five and six. The renovation is funded through private donations by more than 70 individuals and corporations to the Department of Intercollegiate Athletics.

However, K-State will lose seats. Before the renovation, K-State was able to accommodate about 2,800 people in the north end zone with the use of folding chairs, and after the expansion there will be room for 1,200-1,800 permanent seats.

"Clearly, upgrading the Vanier (Football) Complex to meet the needs of a football program in the Big 12 Conference has been one of our pressing facility needs," Tim Weiser, athletics director, said. "Come next season, the look and functionality of that building will be greatly enhanced."

Phases four, five and six of the renovation to Vanier was started two days after former coach Bill Snyder's final game. The first three phases, completed between the 2004 and 2005 seasons, consisted of renovations to insufficient strength and conditioning and sports medicine centers and equipment area.

Most changes that came with the first three phases are not prominent, but visitors will notice the 23-foot-high by 61-foot-wide widescreen video board. There also will be a new custom LED scoring system that will project complete game information, replacing the old one that showed only the score and game clock.

The video board will be placed at the south end of the stadium between the two existing statistic boards. It will be directly across from the new permanent seats at the north end zone, replacing the lawn and folding chairs section.

Junior running back Thomas Clayton said the team is anxious for the renovations to be done.

"A lot of guys will be happy," Clayton said. "Happy players win ball games. It will help get new recruits, which will help keep the dynasty going, and we're about to start it up again this year."

Future phases of the project include updated office space for the head coach and offensive and defensive coordinators. Remodeled locker rooms, a player lounge and the Via Christi Hydrotherapy Training Center also are part of future phases. The new center was named for the donations from Via Christi Health Systems, Preferred Health Systems and Mercy Health System.

The center will have a multi-depth pool for rehabilitating injured student athletes. The pool is 12-feet long by six-feet wide and is five-feet deep. It will circulate about 30,000 gallons of water per minute and create a wall of water that generates more than 40 water speeds up to 6.5 mph, according to www.kstatesports.com.

Bust of Martin Luther King Jr. unveiled

Christopher Hanewinkel | COLLEGIAN

Kansas Board of Regents member Dan Lykins, left, and K-State President Jon Wefald unveil a new sculpture of Dr. Martin Luther King Jr. The sculpture will be permanently placed outside Ahearn Field House in April.

A bust of Martin Luther King Jr. that will be installed in front of Ahearn Field House this year was unveiled Friday afternoon.

The ceremony occurred during the week that marked the 20th observance of the federal holiday in King's name.

It began with a luncheon in the K-State Alumni Center, after which the attendees marched north on 17th Street through falling snow. Many held hands in groups of two or three, but some walked alone in the long, narrow line that advanced up the hill.

A lectern with a microphone awaited the party inside Ahearn, its heaters creating a strong hum in the background. A row of 13 chairs were set out in a single line for anyone who needed one, but only a few were taken. The rest of the audience of about 80 people chose to stand.

The clay model of King's bust stood in front of the lectern, surrounded by a thin rope to keep people from getting too close. A dark cloth covered it, a temporary pedestal poking out beneath it.

K-State President Jon Wefald was the first to speak at the ceremony, which marked the end of a week of events centered around King's legacy.

"It's only fitting that Kansas State take very seriously the Martin Luther King week," he said, "because it is a week for all of us here at Kansas State."

Wefald then introduced Dan Lykins, member of the Kansas Board of Regents. Lykins was in the audience of about 7,200 when King presented a convocation lecture on "the future of integration" in Ahearn on Jan. 19, 1968.

"He spoke about equality. He spoke about justice," Lykins said. "I guarantee you, his spirit is in this building, and it will never leave."

Lykins said it was the last time King

Switching rooms common in halls

By Hannah Crippen
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Difficult roommates have been the source of stress for freshmen throughout the years.

Robert Burgess, associate director of administrative services for the Department of Housing and Dining Services, said K-State residence halls were about 97 percent full at the start of the fall semester, and most of the time, students who request to be transferred because of roommate problems have the request granted.

Angela Garman, sophomore in pre-physical therapy, has had roommates move in and out of her room. The woman she originally was supposed to live with was given the opportunity to live in a sorority house the week before move in.

A day later, Garman arrived from work to discover someone else moving into her room. This roommate, Garman said, was very messy, would leave macaroni and cheese out for a week and was never there. Eventually, the roommate withdrew from K-State.

At the beginning of spring semester, a friend of Garman had a cousin who was not getting along with her roommate, and because there was now a space open with Garman, the woman moved in. They both said they have enjoyed the change.

Two types of transfers exist at K-State.

The external transfers, which are between different halls, are authorized by Housing and Dining Services. Internal transfers within a hall are handled there, and do not usually require the help of Housing and Dining Services.

Students requesting a transfer between halls first must fill out an assignment change form. Housing and Dining Services gives the student a time frame in which to make the move.

Burgess said this is when students need to be patient and realize that there is a domino effect throughout the residence halls. He said students need to know that their move may depend on two or three moves that must be completed first.

Sami Valenti, Boyd Hall resident assistant and senior in mass communications, said timing also has a lot to do with roommate switches and move-outs.

For example, a student might want to get into a suite, a friend's roommate moves out, or they make new friends during the semester who they may want to move in with.

She also said some common complaints are opposite schedules and lack of common interests.

"A lot of people think they need to be best friends with that person the first year," Valenti said. "It's really about, 'Can you live with that person?'"

Garman said she thinks the students who go potluck seem to want to move out more often than those who knew their roommates before college.

The Housing and Dining Services Assignment Information Form that incoming freshmen fill out to be placed in residence halls include questions like: Do you smoke? Do you normally go to bed before midnight on weekdays? Do you normally wake up before 7 a.m. on weekdays? Do you normally study while listening to music or watching television?

Goodnow Hall residence life coordinator Kipp Van Dyke said this is the matching mechanism used in the summer. The main factor he looks at is smoking.

Van Dyke said this short survey is not always effective because students' habits may change when they come to college, and sometimes it's the parents who fill out the survey.

He said there is not a secret formula when matching people to be roommates. He has had an equal number of complaints from people who went potluck and those who did not.

Valenti has had a different experience.

"I'm actually surprised how many girls on my floor knew their roommates before they moved in," Valenti said. "That's actually working out really well."

Another reason why residents end up moving out is bad grades.

Van Dyke said at the end of the fall semester there were about 20 cancellations in Goodnow because of academics.

Van Dyke also said he noticed the difference between males and females and their problems with roommates.

"Girls tend to hold stuff in and have more disrespect toward each other," he said. "Males do not ask to switch as often. Usually the reason for a male switch is because someone wants to move in with a friend."

Room switches usually are not a problem because a lot of people do not show up on move-in day, Van Dyke said. Also, in addition to the 20 cancellations due to academics, 29 left this year to graduate, study abroad or transfer halls.

Goodnow had about 30 room switches at semester. Van Dyke said there usually are more in the fall because by the time spring semester comes, students have adjusted.

Valenti said RAs' goals are to avoid hostility between the roommates wanting a switch.

Jonathan Tarnan, Goodnow RA and senior in life sciences, had some advice for students who want to change rooms.

"Give the situation some time to see ways you can adapt to another person's lifestyle as they adapt to you at the same time," Tarnan said. "The next step would be to have a conversation with your roommate about the things that are bothering you and give he/she the opportunity to do the same. Give suggestions on how a lifestyle change on their part would improve your relationship. For those who are shy, your RAs are your best source to provide mediation if you and your roommate don't have an effective line of communication."

Molly Miller, sophomore in biology, left; Shannon Babcock, senior in social science, center; and Leo Falcone, junior at Manhattan High School, paint protest signs to display Monday outside Bramlage Coliseum. Many campus groups and other groups from around the state plan to protest Bush administration policies starting at 9 a.m. today.

Protests to take place at lecture

By Jonas Hogg
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

A group gathered outside Sunday to make plans in anticipation of President George W. Bush's Landon Lecture today.

However, this isn't exactly a welcome wagon.

A coalition of the Manhattan Alliance for Peace and Justice, the Manhattan chapter of the National Organization for Women, Ordinary Women, the Flint Hills chapter of the Kansas Equality Coalition, the Flint Hills chapter of Parents and Friends of Lesbians and Gays, the K-State Progressive Coalition, Students for Environmental Action and the K-State Alliance for Peace and Justice have come together to protest Bush's Landon Lecture.

"I want people to know that Manhattan, Kan., is not a soft place for George Bush to land," said Shannon Babcock, senior in social work and president of Manhattan

NOW. "I want him to know that there is opposition here."

The groups have been collaborating since the lecture was announced on Jan. 18.

Christopher Renner, program assistant to the dean of the College of Education, was on hand to help with the preparations and to assist in the organization of today's activities.

With limited space available, the protesters hope to arrive early and stake out a claim.

"We've been negotiating with Bramlage (Coliseum), and it is sort of first-come, first-served," Renner said.

Renner also said he does not foresee problems with security as the protest will occur outside, which is being secured by K-State Police.

In addition to the outside protest, some students have chosen to obtain tickets and leave their seats vacant.

Megan Challenger, senior in political science and president of Ordinary Women, said there is no one group that has taken this course of action, but that students from Ordinary Women, KSU Young Democrats and Students for Environmental Action were pursuing this initiative.

"Would people find me more offensive if I'm silently protesting by not going there or by showing up and booing?" Challenger said. "I think it's a really good, non-violent way to object to the president's message."

Though the activist groups were the driving force of the protest, some students have become involved independently.

"I just went shopping around on the 'net looking for people that found Bush as incompetent as I do," said Tim Davidson, senior in civil engineering.

Most said they agreed the purpose of the protest was to bring attention to the fact that although Kansans gave 62 percent of their vote to Bush in the 2004 presidential election, there is still opposition within the state.

"I just really want to see a liberal presence from K-State," said Cassidy Creek, sophomore in open-option and president of the K-State Alliance for Peace and Justice.

Candi Dunaway, senior in psychology and President of MAPJ, said the group is ready for the event.

"Everyone is really enthusiastic about it," she said.

The groups will begin arriving at Bramlage at about 8 a.m. today. Members said they hope to protest through the lecture.

"I would just like to put a face on the America that has been ignored through protest," Davidson said.

Kansas State University College Republicans refused to comment, and representatives from the Topeka-based Westboro Baptist Church, which also plans to protest, were unavailable for comment.

TO THE POINT Bush deserves right to be heard at lecture

Today, President George W. Bush will present the 142nd Landon Lecture at Bramlage Coliseum.

A CNN/USA Today Gallup Poll in December found that Bush's approval rating is at 41 percent.

His ratings are low because of controversial issues, such as Operation Iraqi Freedom, the War on Terrorism, abortion issues and First Amendment rights.

However, Bush is still the president of the United States, and he deserves the right to be heard.

Verbal disagreements during the president's lecture eliminate his right to be heard and others right to hear his statements.

If other people choose to applaud and/or give the president a standing ovation, those in opposition should remain silent and seated.

Sometimes, remaining seated and silent makes a more powerful statement than verbal expression.

Civil expression is an American right granted by the First Amendment to the U.S. Constitution.

By silently disagreeing with President Bush, those in disagreement are stronger and more powerful than those who make verbal disagreements. Allow those who want to listen to the president's remarks to hear them.

To the point is an editorial selected and debated by the editorial board and written after a majority opinion is formed. This is the Collegian's official opinion.

Population problem Japan faces prospect of a declining workforce

Recent studies have predicted that Japan, over the next several decades, will continually lose its momentum as a capital mogul.

Japan faces this likely plummet for a number of reasons. One predominant predicament is that the country does not have enough young people to back its escalating population of elderly.

This situation of running low on young people (a.k.a. workers) isn't uncommon.

Europe, as well as many other regions, face similar problems. However, the setback is dynamic in the case of Japan because the country has had such economic triumph for the past several decades.

Because some people think the Japanese mindset is very oriented on work, education and, ultimately, success, many citizens often find little time to raise families and have lives outside of work. The pressure to flourish economically seems to be more important than reproduction of a civilization.

This assumption can be made into reality with evidence showing that more people actually died in Japan last year than were born.

Japan touts its title as a country with one of the oldest life expectancies, but that trophy won't raise too many eyebrows when there's no one around to care for the elderly.

How far can a nation of senior citizens who aren't interested in allowing many immigrants into their country really run in the race to win the world over?

According to ABC reports, Japan currently accounts for about seven percent of world population growth, while America makes up about 35 percent. It is predicted by economists that the workforce in Japan will shrink by about one percent for the next 20 to 30 years. In the United States, it has been predicted that the population could reach as much as 450 million by mid-century.

Countries like China, India and America allow immigrants to enter country borders and, in due course, labor pools.

We live in a nation where our people feel confident enough to have children and families. Because of this, we have developed a renewable source of talent and expanding youth.

By the time we reach a population of 450 million, we will have 150 million more people paying taxes, working and adding to social security funds. We will have a progressive culture and our economy will be booming.

Many countries have the possibility of suffering in the future from a lack of young people and immigrants filtering into their work forces to boost economies. It was said by Peter Hewitt, on a NOVA program, that the United States will be the island of tranquility in a turbulent demographic sea.

By welcoming in lots of young people and immigrants into our workforce, we are, in turn, obtaining innovative, creative minds.

Here's to hoping that our generation and the ones to follow are excited to take the corporate bull by the horns.

Successful jobs about happiness, not money

On the first day of class this year, I felt prepared to begin my second to last semester.

I thought I knew where I was going and where I wanted to be.

Then I went to my very first class of the semester.

I listened to the teacher as he lectured and told us what we would be doing in the class and I was thinking, "I can do this. This will be fun."

Then I had an epiphany - "I don't belong here."

Usually I am the type of person who will stick with something, even if I don't like it, just because I think I might regret it later. But this time, I felt I would regret it more if I did stay in the class.

I spoke with my teacher after class and told him I wasn't feeling that his class, or the second major I had chosen, was anywhere near where I wanted my career to go.

Should I drop my second major?

I started stressing about what it would mean if I became a one-major person. I had planned the rest of my career and internships around the fact that I would have a dual major in advertising and public relations.

Now I had to look at other internships and career options.

What if I didn't make the money I was hoping to make?

I didn't even know if I could get the classes I needed to graduate since I had figured this out so late. I am pretty emotional, so at this point, I started to cry.

The professor handed me a tissue and told me some advice that every college student should know: It's OK.

Five years from now, I will be doing something completely different than what I think I will be doing. I have to trust my instincts and what makes me happy. I didn't have to decide the rest of my life right that second.

He also told me that money didn't mean a whole lot if you weren't happy. Some of his former students had come to him before and had told him that they wanted to do something that would make them no money, but something that they loved; for instance, painting.

They have come back to him since and have been so successful and happy in their lives because they did something that they actually wanted to do.

And then he asked me, what do I want to do? What makes me happy? What would I want to wake up every morning and do?

I've been asked these questions before, but I have never actually felt what would really make me happy. I decided to drop my advertising major.

After I left the professor's office, I felt amazing.

It was like a weight had been lifted. I almost felt liberated.

Why had I been doing things that I didn't want to do for so long?

I guess because I was scared to do something completely based on my feelings and nothing else.

I went online after speaking with my teacher and found, on www.collegedegreeguide.com, that 80 percent of students who start college change their major at least once and many students will change their major many more times.

This made me feel good. Then

I thought about my roommate.

She completely changed her major in the middle of her senior year, but she is still happier than if she had stuck with her other major and graduated on time.

So, even though I am still a tad stressed trying to find classes and new internship opportunities, I am a lot happier.

It's a good thing to know that I won't be spending time on something I don't want to do.

Even though it's really scary, and a part of me feels like maybe I should go back, I know I made the right decision. Because, in the end, being happy is all that really matters.

Life is too short for it not to be.

New grain science complex helps in industry research

By Michlynn Rose
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

K-State is in the process of building a new international grain science complex on the north edge of campus.

The complex will include five buildings: The International Grains Program Conference Center, Bioprocessing and Industrial Value-Added Center, Hal Ross Flour Mill, K-State Feed Mill and the K-State Grain Science Teaching, Research and Baking Building.

The International Grains Program Conference Center and the Bioprocessing and Industrial Value-Added Center are both completed, and the construction of the Hal Ross Flour Mill is in progress.

"The two remaining structures will begin being built when enough money is raised," said Virgil Smail, head of the Department of Grain Science and Industry.

The grain science and industry department will approach the milling, baking and feed industry first to receive funds to start construction on the K-State Grain Science, Teaching, Research and Baking Building, and then ask for funds from the federal and state governments.

"In the long-term, the International Grain Science Complex will help the wheat and cereal industry when they lose farm support in the next 10 years and K-State will work with the World Trade Organization," Smail said.

As the grain science and industry department celebrates its 100th year at K-State, Smail said the grain industry has given the university tremendous support over the years.

"This new complex on campus is very crucial in keeping the support of the grain industry," he said.

Smail said students, faculty and staff can appreciate the new complex because it will contain new facilities, representing the modern image of the industry, as well as the capabilities on campus.

Ronald Madl, administrator in the grain science and industry department, said he has found the new complex to be of great use.

"The Bioprocessing and Industrial Value-Added Center has been open and in use for about a year and has allowed the staff to look beyond a piece of grain and make use of the entire plant," Madl said.

Another way the grain science complex is helping the industry is through research, Madl said.

"This building has provided us to conduct research that help develop new technologies and expand the industry in Kansas," he said.

Smail said he is confident the new complex will recruit more students and educate them about the industry.

"Right now there are not enough graduates to fill the positions in the industry, so they are leaving college with $10,000 more than other agricultural majors, plus bonuses," he said.

Students in the grain science and industry department have been helping in the Bioprocessing and Industrial Value-Added Center, said Eric Maichel, extrusion operations manager.

"It is a nice new facility, and people enjoy working in a clean environment," Maichel said.

K-State uses band clinic to recruit

By Abby Brownback
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

High school students with various woodwind, brass and percussion instruments spread across campus this weekend at the 13th annual Concert Band Clinic.

After being nominated by their high school directors and selected by the Department of Music, about 650 high school band members from more than 90 Kansas and Nebraska high schools auditioned Friday to be placed in one of six concert bands for the weekend, Frank Tracz, K-State's director of bands, said.

One top band and five other equal bands were directed by guest conductors with experience at various universities and colleges.

The conductors spent Friday and Saturday teaching their bands four to six pieces that the bands performed in half-hour concerts Sunday in McCain Auditorium.

The clinic benefits the students in several ways, Tracz said, including giving them the chance to travel to Manhattan and meet new people.

"They get to work with good conductors and play with different band literature," he said.

Randy Ernst, a junior at Northern Heights High School, said he enjoyed the chance to play his tenor saxophone in a larger band for the weekend.

"The music's a little more challenging, so you learn sight-reading better," he said.

Ernst's clinic conductor, David Montgomery, is the director of the Bronco Marching Band at Western Michigan University. Ernst said

Montgomery taught him better posture and to pay attention.

Brittany Donley, a senior at Winfield High School, said she learned to play bass clef music on her contra alto clarinet, a treble clef instrument.

Tracz said the clinic also works as a recruiting event for K-State. He said he expects about 100 of the 650 students at the clinic to enroll at K-State in the next couple of years.

"The main tool's recruiting for music education," Tracz said. "I think it's our call in the state."

Donley said she will attend K-State, and Ernst said he is undecided on a college but probably will choose K-State.

About 150 K-State music education students and band members helped facilitate the weekend activities by setting up equipment, working at the auditions and running the hospitality rooms, Tracz said.

"It's a great kind of internship for the weekend," he said.

Nathaniel Grote, junior in music education, helped place 18 students in the six different bands at Friday's euphoniums auditions.

"We're trying to get high school students to learn more about the instruments and to grow as musical students," he said. "It gets the students to play with other musicians who might be on the same or different levels as them."

The experience also strengthened his reasons for wanting to major in music education, Grote said.

"It helps you understand what's going on with the schools in Kansas," he said. "It helps out a lot with meeting other band directors, other conductors."

Local group brings 'Brokeback Mountain' to city

Movie about gay romance receives mixed reviews from community members

"Brokeback Mountain," the film that won four Golden Globe awards, almost didn't make it to Manhattan.

The movie, about a love affair between two Wyoming cowboys, saw limited release Dec. 9 and came to Seth Childs Cinema, 2610 Farm Bureau Road, on Jan. 6.

Tammi Hawk, president of the Flint Hills chapter of Parents, Families & Friends of Lesbians and Gays, said PFLAG contacted the theater's home office about bringing the movie to Manhattan.

"The Kansas Equality Coalition of the Flint Hills contacted Seth Childs Cinema about showing the movie or said we would take our business to Topeka, Lawrence or Kansas City," she said. "It was my understanding that the management responded by saying the movie was scheduled to open the following week."

A spokesperson for Carmike Cinemas was not available for comment.

Karl Kramer, secretary/treasurer of PFLAG, said he also contacted the company.

"I e-mailed the home office," he said. "They responded courteously within a few hours and said, 'We understand you're very interested. We'll see what we can do.'"

"Brokeback Mountain" is now showing in 1,196 theaters and has brought in $42 million since its opening, according to Yahoo! Movies. It was ranked first in box office standings for three days after the Golden Globes on Jan. 16, but currently stands fifth.

The movie, starring Heath Ledger and Jake Gyllenhaal, is based on a short story by E. Annie Proulx, which was published in 1997 in The New Yorker.

Because of its homosexual themes, some find the movie controversial. A theater in Salt Lake City, canceled the booking of the movie.

"A lot of people won't see the movie because they think it's immoral, but how can they know unless they see it?" Kramer said.

Students have had mixed responses to the movie.

Lindsey Bertels, junior in biology, said she did not like the movie.

"The whole homosexual part of it really didn't bother me," Bertels said. "There was a graphic scene in a tent I didn't really want to see, but I have no problem with that lifestyle."

"I just thought it was incredibly boring. I didn't really like the story line."

Bertels said a few people got up and left the theater during the movie.

Jocelyn Mattoon, junior in anthropology said she thought it was a good love story.

"It showed how circumstances can tear people apart," she said.

K-State needs strong support

The K-State basketball team is entering uncharted territory.

K-State thrashed Missouri on Saturday night 79-64 to move to 3-2 in the Big 12 Conference. The Wildcats have never had a winning conference record this deep in the season in the 10-year history of the conference.

Not only that, but K-State is on a three-game winning streak, is tied for second place in the Big 12 behind Texas and appears to be hitting a groove the likes of which Wildcat fans have not seen in a long time.

On Jan. 14, the Wildcats knocked off Kansas 59-55 for the first time in 32 games, in Allen Fieldhouse, no less.

It's safe to say that game is the highlight of the sports season at K-State. The only possible challenger to that title could be Bill Snyder's final game at K-State against Missouri, but football wins against Missouri were commonplace under Snyder.

K-State came back to beat Texas A&M 58-54 Wednesday night to prove the win over the Jayhawks was not a fluke.

Coupled with Saturday's win against the Tigers, the Wildcats set themselves up for a serious run at finishing in the upper half of the conference and have given K-State fans reason to be optimistic about the Wildcats' prospects of making the NCAA Tournament this season.

But before Wildcat fans put on their dancing shoes, they need to remember that the conference season is still young, and because the Wildcats are new to this being-near-the-top-of-the-league thing, the last thing this team needs is unjustified expectations placed on its shoulders.

Instead, K-State fans should enjoy the moment and not try to put any undue pressure on coach Jim Woodruff or his team.

The Wildcats are trying; that much is obvious. They also are getting better.

Saturday against the Tigers, Woodruff said he saw his team play harder and play more as a team, which led to the big-time win.

"I thought we really played hard," Woodruff said after the Missouri win. "I thought we did all the things that our team has to do to beat people in this league."

The Wildcats have a week off before they try to make it four wins in a row when they match up with Colorado Saturday in Boulder, Colo.

The Buffaloes are deadlocked with the Wildcats and Tigers for second place in the Big 12, and Saturday's game against Colorado will go a long way toward determining who is a player and who is a punk in the Big 12.

All K-State needs from its fans is to keep their minds in the present and support this team in the here and now.

K-State was a free throw away from snatching a win from the Texas Longhorns on Sunday in Austin, Texas, but that one free throw proved elusive as the Wildcats lost 71-70 in overtime.

With 7.5 seconds left in regulation and the game tied at 62-62, freshman guard Shalee Lehning gave the Wildcats a chance for the win after being fouled on a put-back attempt after a missed layup by junior forward Claire Coggins.

On her ensuing free-throw attempts Lehning, who finished with five points and six assists, missed both and sent the game into overtime.

"It's always tough when a player is put on the line with no time on the clock, but there were a lot of opportunities for us that we could have won the game," Coggins said. "Shalee played a great game, and she shouldn't feel bad about the free throws, and she will, but she is that type of competitor."

In overtime, Texas' Daria Mieloszynska and Tamra Cobbins proved to be the difference makers as they scored the Longhorns' final four points in the last 90 seconds to push the Longhorns to the win.

K-State beats Tigers, moves to 2nd in Big 12

The members of the K-State men's basketball team entered the 2005-06 season with a bad taste in their mouths.

Last season, the Wildcats were held out of postseason play for a sixth-straight year, despite a 17-12 overall record.

Conversely, the Missouri Tigers — whom K-State defeated twice last season — played in the postseason National Invitation Tournament after posting a 16-16 record.

"We felt like we should have made it (into the NIT) last year, but that is how things go," junior forward Cartier Martin said. "We can't help the way the system works."

After K-State's 79-64 victory against Missouri Saturday, in front of 12,326 fans at Bramlage Coliseum, the Wildcats have now defeated the Tigers in three-straight games, evening the overall series at 111 wins apiece.

Also — and perhaps more importantly — the win moved K-State (12-4, 3-2) into a second-place tie in the Big 12 Conference behind Texas.

Fifteen minutes into Saturday's 79-64 Wildcat victory against the Missouri Tigers, Missouri junior Thomas Gardner hit a baseline jumper.

Luckily for the K-State men's basketball team, that was Gardner's first field goal of the game.

Gardner, the Big 12 Conference leader in scoring at 21.7 points per game, ended up scoring 21 points in his team's losing effort, but he repeatedly found it difficult to break free from the tight defense of a few Wildcat players.

Among the Wildcats who starred in the superb defensive effort was junior guard Akeem Wright. Wright started the game defending Gardner and refused to let him reach any sort of comfort level in front of the season-high 12,326 in attendance at Bramlage Coliseum.

Wright said it was important to make sure Gardner did not get off to a hot start.

"I think I did a pretty good job on (Gardner) in the first half," he said. "I made him work extra hard for all his shots. He was coming off a 40-point game, so I knew he felt good coming into the gym."

Wright was speaking of the career-high 40 points Gardner dropped on

NFL | Steelers, Seahawks heading to Super Bowl

In Denver, Ben Roethlisberger had a brilliant afternoon, throwing for 275 yards and two scores, and Jerome Bettis extended his career one more game, lifting the Steelers to a dominating 34-17 victory in the AFC title game Sunday.

The Broncos (14-4), outscored, outplayed and pushed around all day, shuffled off to their locker room, heads down, after their first home loss in 10 tries this season.

Meanwhile, in Seattle, the Seahawks' Shaun Alexander, a killer defense and playing on a field where they didn't lose this season, all combined perfectly Sunday to help the Seahawks rout the Carolina Panthers 34-14 in the NFC title game.

In this case, it means the Seahawks (15-3) will meet the Pittsburgh Steelers, 34-17 winners over Denver in the AFC, in the Super Bowl. That game will be played in Detroit on Feb. 5 and the Steelers already are favored by 3 1/2 points.

Bands compete for chance to perform at Wakarusa

Eighteen cities. Eighteen parties. Eighteen winners. This is the motto for Battlerusa 2006 — The Road to Wakarusa, the Midwest's Battle of the Bands. It will be stopping tonight and Tuesday night in Manhattan at Auntie Mae's Parlor.

The tour began Jan. 18 in Fort Collins, Colo., and will continue until Feb. 9 and 10, with two final battles at the Bottleneck in Lawrence.

The individual city winners are invited and will be able to showcase their talents one more time before the 2006 Wakarusa Music Festival.

According to its Web site, Wakarusa attracts more than 20,000 fans and will be host to more than 70 artists this June in Lawrence.

Joshua Grigaitis, founding member of Loyal Family, a collective organization, said the festival is beneficial to the local music scene.

Loyal Family is a vehicle for promoting booking, event production and graphic design. Together with Wakarusa and Moonstruck Promotions, Loyal Family is working to promote the 18-city tour in hopes of exposing local talent on a national level.

"Our goal is to create an outlet for artists to continue what they do and do it for a living," Grigaitis said. "Wakarusa is a grass-root music festival and they want to make the festival successful and give these bands a chance. They aren't in for just money."

He said there are two priorities for Battlerusa — the opportunity for Grigaitis said bands and fans have been grateful to be able to play and see a good show. He said he thinks they are able to bring in the vibe of a local music festival to each city.

The band that wins in each city is later invited to the final battle, and the two winners of that will receive the "Loyal Treatment." This package includes a track on the 2006 Wakarusa Compilation compact disc, a band listing on all promotions for the festival and an upgraded slot in the show.

He said the only problem so far on the tour has been the weather. Snow kept them in Denver, but they were able to get out of there on time.

"We are definitely planning on making this an annual thing," Grigaitis said. "We are shooting for keeping the festival grass root, and with Loyal Family leading the way, I hope this will last for a while."

Eric Noble, coordinator for Wakarusa and founding member of Loyal Family, said they threw out names for the tour and "Battlerusa" stuck. He said students should come to the shows because it will be fun.

Members from Audio Spaghetti will perform tonight at Battlerusa for a chance to play at Wakarusa this summer. The Wakarusa Music Festival is June 8, 9 and 10 in Lawrence. For more information about Wakarusa visit www.wakarusa.com. Tickets are on sale for $89.

"It is just a certain vibe that is given out," Noble said. "It is all about coming out and having a good time. Even if you don't know the band, come to have a good time and get to know the band."

Noble said Wakarusa macro-manages the tour and the event staff have been cooperative with Loyal Family. Bands were selected just by listening to their music and deciding if they were right for Wakarusa. More than 200 bands submitted music, but only 100 were selected.

"Every band that was excellent in one way or another, and we just had a feel for what would make a diverse band," Noble said.

He said Wakarusa is successful because it offers local bands the opportunity to play in front of thousands of people and get a boost for their music career.

"We picked the cities so we could get a nice reaction to what we are bringing to their town," he said. "I just hope that people come out and represent their town, including Manhattan."

Jeff Denney, manager and co-owner of Auntie Mae's Parlor, said he was approached last year as a ticket outlet, and this year tour managers contacted him and thought it would be a good idea.

"I have been hearing people talk about it, so it should be a good show," Denney said.

He said he doesn't see capacity as a problem, because it is a Monday and Tuesday, and bands play at Auntie Mae's all the time.

Couple faces jail time after Wendy's scam

In March 2005, Anna Ayala and Jaime Plascencia staged a plot to reap millions from the fast food chain Wendy's.

Plascencia obtained a severed human finger from one of his co-workers who lost it in an accident. The couple proceeded to place the finger in a bowl of Wendy's chili and attempted to sue for damages.

Authorities were wary of the claim as the finger was never cooked as it should be if it had been in the pot of chili.

The couple pleaded guilty to charges of conspiracy to file a false insurance claim and attempted grand theft. Ayala faces nine years in jail and Plascencia faces 12.

A difference between men, women

LONDON — Germans have a word for it — schadenfreude — and when it comes to getting pleasure from someone else's misfortune, men seem to enjoy it more than women.

Such is the conclusion reached by scientists at University College London in what they say is the first scientific evidence of schadenfreude.

Using brain-imaging techniques, they compared how men and women reacted when watching other people suffer pain. If the sufferer was someone they liked, areas of the brain linked to empathy were activated.

Women had a similar response if they disliked the person experiencing the pain but men showed a surge in the reward areas of the brain.

"The women had a diminished empathic response," said Klaas Enno Stephan, a co-author of the report. "But it was still there, whereas in the men it was completely absent."

Invigorating album tugs on heart strings, tackles love

"Feels"

Album review by Mark Sibilla

Love: this universal human sensation has been the emotion most pondered and deliberated by the greatest minds in human history.

With so many musings on love, it comes as no surprise that very few offer an original perspective. If anyone could bring something new to the table, it would be the latest album from a highly acclaimed New York collective — Animal Collective, to be exact.

In interviews, Animal Collective unabashedly admits its latest to be its album. It accomplishes this not just with lyrics, which are mostly cryptic, stream-of-consciousness ramblings, but also with dense musical compositions and experimental pop stylings.

Simply put, "Feels" feels like being in love.

With its earlier records, Animal Collective used wild experimentalism that pushed the boundaries of music. "Feels" is the Collective's most accessible album to date.

This new approach is immediately evident in album opener "Did You See the Words." Opening at a brisk saunter of child-like giggles and dreamy guitar, the track quickly bursts into a full sprint of tinkling piano and steady percussion.

"Grass" is composed of formless burbling before tribal drums and a heavily processed guitar takes over. Panda Bear sings the lyrics with such excitement that he almost trips over his own words.

This segues into the lazy waltz, "Flesh Canoe." But Animal Collective was never a band that colors within the lines.

The downbeat is constantly shifted to accommodate the drifting non-sequitur lyrics.

The singing, about waking up next to a significant other, seems to be swimming upstream against the music, almost competing to be heard above the extravagant production.

"The Purple Bottle" picks up the tempo as it breathlessly sustains its passion throughout the song's many shifting sections. Following this, the album slows down and settles into a more subtle song craft.

The album continues its ambient soundscapes with the meandering "Daffy Duck" and the gorgeously tender, "Loch Raven."

"Feels" closes with "Turn Into Something," a song that picks up the energy and finishes the album solidly.

With its latest, Animal Collective has proven it is one of the most consistently inspired acts of the new millennium.

In "Feels," Animal Collective has built an invigorating album one can truly love.

Curtis Allen, left, and Akeem Wright celebrate K-State's 79-64 win over Missouri at half-court Saturday night at Bramlage Coliseum. With the win over the Tigers, the Wildcats won their third-straight game in conference play.

WRIGHT | Allen picked up defense in 2nd half

Kansas in the Tigers 89-86 overtime win against the Jayhawks last Monday.

Gardner missed his first three shots of the game and by halftime had managed to produce only six points on 1-of-6 shooting, no rebounds and three turnovers.

When Wright picked up his fourth foul with 18 minutes, 24 seconds remaining in the second half, coach Jim Wooldridge turned to backup junior guard Curtis Allen to help out on Gardner.

"(Allen) played great," Wooldridge said. "He came in and played with confidence. He played hard. He produced on both ends of the floor. He was a big part of that win."

Wright was quick to compliment Allen's play but also made sure everyone knew who K-State's top defender was.

"I'd say (Allen) is the second best defender, next to me," Wright said with a smile. "He's just as athletic as me, just as quick."

Gardner finished the game with his average, 21 points. However, it took 5-of-16 shooting, including 1-of-8 from three-point range and visible frustration to get to those 21 points.

After the game, Gardner voiced his frustration.

"Kansas and (Oklahoma State) play the same way, but K-State was a little dirtier with it," Gardner said. "Pulling jerseys, tripping, bumping when I'm running, but it's something I have to take."

Gardner then offered a bit of a threat toward the Wildcats for the next meeting, a Feb. 12 matchup in Columbia, Mo.

"It was a little disrespectful," he said, "but we'll get them back when they come to play in Missouri."

Wooldridge said he was surprised when he learned Gardner called his team's play "dirty."

"There wasn't any dirt - we were trying to guard him," Wooldridge said. "I don't think so. I didn't see any of that. We don't teach that."

Wright said Gardner's frustration was clear to him, and it only reaffirmed that he was defending him well.

"He was talking to his players, saying, 'Get me open. Set more screens,'" Wright said. "The more he complained to the refs, the more I thought I was doing a pretty good job on him."

Gardner, who scored 40 points against Kansas on Jan. 16, finished with 21 points on 5-of-16 shooting. He was just 1-8 from beyond the three-point arc and turned the ball over six times.

After trading baskets to start the game, K-State quickly earned its 10th team foul with 7:53 left in the first half. Coach Jim Wooldridge threw his suit jacket and, the Wildcats started pulling away by reaching halftime on a 21-9 run.

After halftime, with foul trouble keeping Martin and junior Akeem Wright on the bench, sophomore guard David Hoskins provided a spark by scoring 12 of his 18 points in the second half.

Junior forward Tyler Hughes extended K-State's lead to 20 by hitting a free throw with 11:25 to go.

Gardner and Missouri started to rally back, but K-State's lead was too much for the Tigers to overcome.

Martin said the Wildcats felt a little extra incentive to win this game because of the two teams' recent history.

"We feel like we've got a little rivalry thing with Missouri," Martin said. "They may not feel that way, but when we play against those guys, we really feel like we want to beat them."

Martin, who led K-State in scoring with 20 points, has scored in double figures every game this season. And he's not just contributing offensively, Wooldridge said.

"He's defending, he's on the floor (going after loose balls), and these kids are seeing that," Wooldridge said. "He's all about winning. That, to me, carries over to other people on the team. It's really unselfish."

Hard play and unselfishness have helped K-State in its current three-game winning streak, which is its longest conference win streak since the Big 12's inception in 1996.

"There is no star-type attitude - there is no pointing on the floor," Wooldridge said. "We've got guys really working at it. That's a good sign."

K-State's hard work paid off in the rebounding department with a 38-29 edge over Missouri. Senior forward Dramane Diarra led K-State with 13 rebounds, including six on the offensive end.

"Play hard and out-rebound people - that would be the main keys to win every game, especially in this league," Diarra said. "Everybody's so big and athletic. It's not about talent, it's about who wants the ball first."

K-State's next game is 8 p.m. Saturday in Colorado.

canceled class for Monday, and others stressed to students that they would not be allowed to cut class to attend the lecture.

To attend the lecture, K-State students, faculty and staff had to acquire free tickets Thursday at Snyder Family Stadium. The massive line wound around the entire parking lot.

"I have never, in my almost 20 years here, seen anything like that ... we may have set a record for the longest line," Charlie Thomas, director of Bramlage, said.

Robin Fosha, director of ticket operations for the Department of Intercollegiate Athletics, said everyone who waited in the line got a seat and the only people who were turned away were stragglers who came later.

Charles Reagan, chairman of the Landon Lecture series, said about 6,000 tickets were set aside for students, and 1,500 were made available to faculty and staff.

Security will be tight, and people who have tickets for the lecture would be wise to come early, he said.

The release that announced the lecture last week said handbags, backpacks, cameras, briefcases or bags of any kind will not be allowed into the lecture, and there is no place to check bags.

spoke at a university before he was assassinated on April 4, 1968.

Wefald said the late Sen. Robert F. Kennedy, D-N.Y., presented a Landon Lecture in Ahearn on March 18, 1968. It was the first speech he gave after announcing his candidacy for president two days earlier.

He also was assassinated not long after, on June 5 of that year.

When Lykins finished, Myra Gordon, associate provost for diversity and dual career development, delivered a libation, the pouring of a liquid for a religious purpose, to dedicate the site.

"Our purpose is to awaken and hallow this ground, to call down the blessing of the spirit," Gordon said.

She used water for the ceremony, which she said was a symbol of the continuity of life and of immortality.

The ceremony was originally planned to be outside in front of Ahearn where the libation would be poured on the ground, but inclement weather prevented that.

Instead, earth from the future site of the sculpture was carried inside a large, ornate jar and the libation poured into it. After the ceremony, the earth was put back outside.

After the libation was over, Wefald and Lykins unveiled the clay model of King's bust to applause from the audience.

Several members of Alpha Phi Alpha came forward and surrounded the model, crossed their arms, joined hands and sang "The Alpha Phi Alpha, Inc., Fraternal Hymn."

Richard Bergen, the bust's sculptor, came forward and spoke briefly. Bergen said he made the bust to be a composite of several pictures of King taken throughout his lifetime.

He is the sculptor who made the Ad Astra bronze sculpture that stands atop the Kansas Capitol.

Bergen said the clay model also would be cast in bronze and would be complete in three to four months.

"That sculptor is great," said Bryon Williams, sophomore in economics and philosophy and member of Alpha Phi Alpha. "He put a lot of detail in it, and I'm really proud of it."

the increased usage of Seth Child Road.

"The traffic flow on that road has greatly increased over the last 15 years and the new interchange will be able to handle additional traffic volumes and expected traffic volumes in the future," he said.

Haug said additional construction includes the addition of a stoplight that will serve southbound Seth Child Road traffic to eastbound K-18.

The construction project is a state rather than a city project because Seth Child Road is a state highway and not a city road.

The project is scheduled to conclude late summer this year.

Schorzman said there are no plans for additional road construction projects of this magnitude for Manhattan in the near future.

The road construction has not affected business, said Miranda Smith, manager of Panera Bread, 315 Southwind Place.

"I really haven't noticed any major change with business," Smith said. "We seem to be as busy as usual."

Down 71-68 in overtime, freshman center JoAnn Hamlin, who finished with 18 points, nearly forced a second overtime with a jumper as time expired, but the Douglass, Kan., native was just inside the three-point line.

The Wildcats (13-4, 3-3 Big 12 Conference) and Longhorns (10-6, 4-2), who had split their previous four meetings, battled back and forth the entire game with the lead changing hands 11 times before Texas finally came away with its fourth straight conference win.

"It was tough," Coggins said. "We played really hard, and Texas is a great team, and we were able to take them into overtime, but it was tough to lose it."

In the first half, Coggins caught fire from beyond the three-point arc, hitting five of her six threes, to lead the Wildcats on a 17-5 run to finish out the half, leading the Longhorns, 34-27.

"I was fortunate enough to get some good looks," said Coggins, who had a game and career-high 26 points. "My teammates got me open and got me some good passes, and any time you can get something to fall against a team like Texas, it's a good day."

In the second half, Texas stormed back behind the play of All-American Tiffany Jackson (23 points, 14 rebounds) with a 14-4 run to open the half and built a six-point lead with less than 12 minutes left.

The Wildcats would use a 9-0 run to regain the lead later in the half, but the Longhorns wouldn't go away, Coggins said.

"I think Texas stepped up big time in the second half," Coggins said.

Bush enjoys friendly crowd at lecture, restates policies on war, wiretapping

By Logan C. Adams
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

President George W. Bush used his Landon Lecture appearance Monday to restate his opinions on the war on terror and defend wiretapping private communications without court-approved warrants.

The president sported a purple tie he credited Sen. Pat Roberts, R-Kan., with providing. Roberts has been acknowledged by university officials for finally getting Bush to come to K-State after years of invitations.

K-State President Jon Wefald gave him a K-State football jersey with the name "BUSH" on the back, as well as the number 43, meant to symbolize him being the 43rd president. Coincidentally, 43 was the number of K-State running back Darren Sproles, who now is playing for the San Diego Chargers.

Bush was flanked on his right in Bramlage Coliseum by about 800 Fort Riley soldiers who Wefald said had just returned from serving in Iraq. An estimated 9,500 people attended.

Bush started by describing his job to the audience, saying he remains optimistic about the remainder of his term.

"Imagine somebody that said, 'Follow me and the world would be worse,'" he said.

He moved on to the war on terrorism, specifically al-Qaeda, but remained firm on his plan to defeat the terrorist group led by Osama bin Laden.

"The doctrine still stands," he said. "If you harbor a terrorist, you are equally as guilty as the terrorist."

The president also countered claims he rushed to war. He stressed that the decision to send troops into Iraq came after large amounts of planning and multiple resolutions from the United Nations demanding Iraq submit to its scrutiny.

Bush said there are three groups that form the enemy in Iraq, the "rejectionists," or Sunnis who have been slow to adapting to democracy; the Saddam-loyalists; and al-Qaeda. He said the first had begun to turn toward the new Iraqi government, while the latter two will take time to defeat.

The president also fired back at critics who have said the war is becoming a failure.

"I want to listen to the people who

Alumnus' 'Brokeback Mountain' question captures national spotlight

By Christina Hansen
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Two-thousand five K-State graduate Jeremy Parker said to President Bush, "You're a rancher. A lot of us here in Kansas are ranchers. I was just wanting to get your opinion on 'Brokeback Mountain,' if you've seen it?"

Amid audience laughter, Bush responded, "I haven't seen it. I'll be glad to talk about ranching, but I haven't seen the movie."

Parker said the media attention began at about 3 p.m. Monday as he was eating dinner at a local restaurant.

"My phone rang," he said, "and it was none other than 'Inside Edition' wanting to schedule an interview. And then I went home and turned on the TV and couldn't believe what I saw."

Parker's comments appeared on several national news broadcasts, including the "NBC Nightly News," "Inside Edition," and CNN's "The Situation Room."

Despite the media coverage, Parker said he was surprised to find himself in the national spotlight.

"I never dreamed I would have my 15 minutes of fame this soon," he said.

"I'm elated to be receiving this kind of attention."

Charles Reagan, associate to the president and chairman of the Landon Lecture Series, said President Bush's question-and-answer session was not confirmed until Monday morning before the lecture.

"The night before the President's speech, I left Bramlage at 11 p.m.," he said. "I didn't believe there would be any questions, but we tested some wireless mics just in case."

Reagan said he thought the question-and-answer session with the President was very successful.

"He stayed so long," he said. "Usually, people answer four or five questions. He was there about 50 minutes."

Reagan said he was aware of the coverage Parker's question was receiving but did not think any question posed was inappropriate.

Overall, Reagan said he was impressed by the President's conduct.

"He thanked those who asked questions, told them their questions were important and even called several of the speakers by name. I thought he was very respectful to all the people who asked questions," he said.

Rich Seidler, general manager of Kaup Furniture, just began renting an extra warehouse for the excess inventory at the store. Kaup Furniture is open from 9 a.m. to 6 p.m. Monday through Saturday and 1 to 5 p.m. on Sundays.

Area economy set for large gains

Chamber of Commerce, renters brace for soldiers' return

By Michael Ashford
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

When Rich Seidler, general manager of Kaup Furniture Co., 2829 Amherst Ave., first heard thousands of troops would be transferred to Fort Riley, he knew it was time to take action.

Although he had tossed around the idea of renting an extra warehouse for the extra inventory his store was accumulating, the news of the military additions less than 20 miles away was the breaking point, Seidler said.

"The troops were the catalyst that led me to take the plunge that I'd been thinking about taking for the last year," said Seidler, who recently started renting an extra warehouse for Kaup Furniture's overflow merchandise. "It wasn't only because of the troops, but they were probably the final determining factor in the decision."

More than 9,000 soldiers are set to relocate to Fort Riley and the Manhattan area as part of the U.S. Department of Defense's Base Realignment and Closure plan, and Manhattan area businesses like Kaup Furniture Co. stand to see significant gains as a result.

"As troops and their families arrive, there'll be a big impact on retail sales and service sector sales," said Lyle Butler, Manhattan Chamber of Commerce president. "It's a huge, huge economic impact for the whole region, not just Manhattan, but Riley County, Geary County and Pottawatomie County."

"At a minimum, there's going to be tremendous growth over the next five years, but probably the next 10 years."

Currently, Fort Riley has estimated that the base's effect on the Manhattan area economy is more than $800 million a year. When the base relocations are complete — including the return of the U.S. Army's 1st Infantry Division, or "Big Red One" — some base figures have that number exceeding $1 billion a year, Butler said.

That figure has local business owners like Seidler excited.

"We do a lot of business with military, but we also do a lot of business with non-military," he said. "My way of thinking is that the impact the troops are going to have on our economy is going to be twofold. There's going to be the initial impact of the troops themselves when they come in buying goods and services. There'll be a secondary effect as those dollars that are received by other people start to ripple through the economy."

"What I foresee, not only for my business, but for anyone else that's in the goods or services business, is an impact the military will have with their dollars plus the impact people who receive those dollars will have when they go out and make expenditures."

Manhattan community leaders began the process of preparing for such a large economic effect about 18 months ago when a plan was formed to help the city handle the influx of an estimated 11,000 or more people — troops and their families — into Manhattan and the surrounding area.

Apartments, duplexes and single-family homes began

Rich Seidler
KAUP FURNITURE GENERAL MANAGER

sprouting up in and around Manhattan, and now, a six-and-a-half month, $350,000 study funded by the Department of Labor is under way to officially determine just how much of an effect the troop relocation will have on not only Manhattan, but the surrounding region.

John Armbrust, executive director of the Governor's Strategic Military Planning Commission, said the study will involve several sub-studies such as an economic forecasting and policy model, called an REMI, used to predict population and demographic changes in the community and region as a result of growth.

Factors such as employment, income, educational needs, infrastructure, the overall economic outlook, and retail and business assessments will be included in the general study, with hopes of being able to equip Manhattan and the region with the information it needs to handle the anticipated economic effect, Armbrust said.

"We expect to take the results of this model and say, 'This is what (the troop influx) is going to add based on demographics,'" Armbrust said. "We expect that these are the kinds of things and changes and growth patterns you'll have to begin to work and look at."

The most immediate effect will be in the housing market, Butler said.

In an average year, Manhattan and Junction City build 500 housing units. Butler said within the next two years, the area will have to construct 6,000 housing units, not just to accommodate the troops, but also to make up for the normal population progression.

"This is a huge economic impact, which creates a lot of construction jobs just to build the houses and apartments and the duplexes," Butler said.

For businesses like Kaup Furniture Co., preparations are ongoing as troops begin to flow into the region. By the end of April, about 2,800 members of the 4th Brigade Infantry Division will join the 968 members already on base.

By renting an extra warehouse, Seidler, who came to Fort Riley himself as a sergeant in the late 1960s and stayed in Manhattan, said Kaup Furniture took a leap of faith, but it was not a decision based solely on the military.

"It's a risk that anyone in business takes everyday, whether you factor the troops in or not," he said. "Honestly, I don't view the fact that we have more people coming in as changing that equation. The troops coming back here probably enforced that decision for me."

Power outage closes care center

By Jessi Hernandez
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The K-State Child Development Center experienced difficulties when electrical problems caused a power outage Monday.

"We're doing a roofing job out there, and in the electrical room, the work up on the roof shook loose some of the electrical feeds on the ceiling," said Skyler Harper, assistant director in the Department of Housing and Dining Services. "But I wouldn't say it was just that — I think when the electrical work was done by a contractor about eight years ago, it looked like the supports that hold those conduits up there weren't very good — but they are now."

The detachment of the electrical work from the ceiling was a situation that called for immediate attention, because the situation in the electrical room was potentially dangerous until the power could be shut off, Debra Ring, Child Development Center director, said.

"We called maintenance, and they responded right away," Ring said. "They shut off all the power so they could work on it immediately. It was a serious situation. Maintenance workers weren't even allowed in the room until all the power was shut off."

Because of the power outage, the building was without phones, heat, and the fire alarms were disabled, Ring said.

"As a part of our license, we can't be open if those things aren't functioning, so we had to use our cell phones to call parents to come pick up their kids," Ring said.

For busy parents, the calls weren't always received right away.

"I didn't know about (the power outage) until 3 today," said Rebecca Wood, project coordinator for the provost's office, and whose child attends the Child Development Center. "We just didn't get the message until that time. It's frustrating, because then I had to get ahold of my husband to pick up our child, and by that time, she was the last one in her class. I felt so bad."

Wood expressed concern about the condition of the building, with the electrical problems that occurred, and the age of the facility.

"It concerns me that we could possibly be in another situation where there's no power, no heat, and it takes three hours to get ahold of parents," Wood said. "The parents here at K-State need this center, but it needs to be upgraded."

Ring also said the condition of the current building has been an issue for awhile, and that plans are in the very early stage for building a new facility sometime in the future.

TO THE POINT Patience needed for Fort Riley soldier influx

Within the next few years, Manhattan, Junction City and the surrounding area stand to see enormous population changes as the result of military relocations to Fort Riley.

As part of the government's Base Relocation and Closure plan, entire military divisions will be permanently moved to the military outpost, bringing with them around 9,000 troops plus their families.

Because of such a massive population increase in such a short amount of time, the potential for an immense amount of strain and stress on the region exists.

The daily lives of everyone living in this area, including the students and faculty of K-State, will be affected, and as such, a certain level of patience and understanding is needed.

Commuting to and from work or school may take longer due to increased traffic on the roads. Seats may be harder to come by at the many restaurants around town. Finding housing may not be quite as easy.

But rest assured, the cities of Manhattan and Junction City, and the corresponding region and county governments are hard at work to make sure this growth period disrupts our lives as little as possible.

Educate yourself on the effects Manhattan and the region will face, and be aware that everyone will be adjusting to these changes at the same time.

To the point is an editorial selected and debated by the editorial board and written after a majority opinion is formed. This is the Collegian's official opinion.

Google made right choice denying record access

I don't normally have many good things to say about Internet giant Google.

JACI BOYDSTON

To me, it's the technological equivalent of Wal-Mart — they're both probably trying to take over the world, but that doesn't mean I do anything to stop them.

As each adds new features — pharmacies, restaurants and beauty salons for one, Gmail, Google Talk and Google Video for the other — they come one step closer to total world domination.

Despite those possibly sinister implications, I can't stay away from the easy-to-use, comprehensive searching capabilities or the $4.98 cases of Diet Coke.

However, Google did something last Thursday to make me change my tune a little.

Unlike competing search engines Yahoo, MSN and America Online, it refused to comply with an unreasonable request from the federal government.

In August 2005, the Justice

Department subpoenaed piles upon piles of Google search records, including one million randomly-generated Web sites in its database and every search term entered for any one-week period, which could number in the billions.

The Justice Department maintains that this huge amount of information is necessary to determine the prevalence of online child pornography and revive the Child Online Protection Act, which the Supreme Court struck down in 2004 on First Amendment issues.

Unlike its collaborationist counterparts, Google has been refusing this request since August, saying the demand is overbroad and that cooperating would reveal business secrets.

Google's right — the request is ridiculously overbroad.

To discover how much child pornography is online, the government needs a detailed record of what people search for on Google?

Why can't the government investigate the prevalence of online child pornography without official records?

It sure seems like the entire Justice Department could get together one night with a case of beer and a bucket of chicken and start entering raunchy search terms to get a pretty good idea of what all is out there.

I considered doing it myself, but when the day comes when we can be punished for what we've Googled, I didn't want "child pornography" on my record.

Unfortunately, what seems much more likely is that the detailed information the government hopes to get by subpoena is intended for some other purpose not at all related to online pornography.

Maybe whatever it hoped to achieve by secretly listening to the international phone conversations of thousands of Americans can be accomplished by perusing our Google searches instead.

That's the most troubling thing of all — what if someday we could be punished for the things we tried to learn more about?

Completely innocent search terms can start to look pretty suspicious when filtered through a lens of government paranoia.

Ever had to do a report on Nazi Germany for a history class? Ever visit Fred Phelps' "God Hates Fags" site to try to understand why he was protesting a football game?

Think how suspicious your search terms could look to someone who has no concept of context.

Personally, I've Googled al-Qaeda, and I hope everyone else has, too. We should all want to learn more about the organization that has had and continues to have such a huge effect on American life and American foreign policy. But, were the government to associate my computer's IP address with those search terms, I likely would have all my searches monitored indefinitely.

Google is right to refuse this request. And the next time you need to learn about the Communist Manifesto or anything even remotely "anti-American," remember which search engines cooperate with overreaching government requests and which one tries to protect users' privacy.

Immigration crisis has solutions

It is an oft spoken claim of the bird-brained that our borders are "broken," and that great hordes of the unwashed are swarming to assault our culture or "steal our jobs" or some such nonsense.

How many who bemoan immigration know: A. Where Mexico's original borders were, B. the growth rate of the Latino middle class, C. what the hell they're talking about?

Want to solve the "immigration crisis"? Here's how.

I. Get rid of minimum wage.

With all the hoo-ing and ha-ing about a living wage, there are still plenty willing to walk, at best, through the worst parts of our southern border. Or at worst, through San Francisco, to work for less than the fiddle gummit's mandate of five bucks and three nickels an hour.

Eliminating the minimum wage would send the price of goods crashing to the floor, make the American economy more competitive and eliminate the need for businesses to hire under-the-table employees.

Contrary to popular argument, Hispanics do not lie in ambush waiting for the employed so they can "take your job." Many are simply willing to do more work for less pay in a system where people "compete." That means they get the job and you don't.

Think you're entitled to work? Try Cuba. I hear they do work entitlements there. Get yourself something nice and federal like filing Castro's bunions.

II. End the War on Drugs.

The WoD has, sadly, entrenched itself in the septic system of American culture. Police departments and sheriffs get dough from Uncle Sam, the Ad Council publishes lies, judges and bureaucrats get rich while thousands rot in jail for a crime that harms absolutely nobody.

Canning the WoD would mean a loss of federal jobs (maybe we could lower taxes then). Thus losing hordes of D.C.'s finest, namely, the incompetent, illiterate and unemployed, upon an unsuspecting population.

In dumping vast sums of money — more than $3 billion already for 2006 — to "protect" ourselves from the evils of imported drugs, we seem oblivious to the fact that drugs are a domestic problem.

No one in Colombia uses cocaine.

In actuality, the only consumers of coke in Latin America are tourists, who snort it up faster than it can be ground down.

Termination of the WoD eliminates the need for illegal traffic, both of people and goods.

III. Can entitlement programs ... for everyone.

We should view government programs as an injustice thrust upon immigrants rather than a benefit they are unjustly receiving. Public schools are wretched. Medicaid is harmful.

Even if immigrants are unfairly mooching off of free government programs, which they are not, that is an argument against the welfare-state, not immigration.

Why does anyone have the right to take money from another for their own gain?

Before schools were federalized, graduates were literate. Before there was Medicaid, doctors made house calls. Seems like a working system to me — beats the hell out of modern times, anyway.

Studio a day, night task

By Lacey D. Mackey
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The sun beams through the windows of Seaton Court 207 on Saturday afternoon, shedding light on a group of students diligently pasting together paper models.

Daniel Gensch, junior in architecture, sits on a stool by his desk and chats with his classmates, playing with a rubber band as he waits for copies to continue working on his study model for studio.

Gensch said he has always had an interest in building and coming up with new, creative ideas.

"I have always been an artist and a builder," Gensch said. "When I was young, I always was interested in Legos and stuff."

When he was in high school, Gensch said he visited a friend who was a third-year architecture student and knew he wanted to come to K-State.

"She showed me everything," Gensch said. "K-State is well-known for its program, and I've always been a Wildcat fan."

Before coming to K-State, Gensch said he heard about the reputation of studio from a friend who was an architect but was unprepared for what he was getting into.

"My friend said, 'Hopefully, you love studio, because you'll live there,'" Gensch said. "I thought he was kidding."

In his second year of the program, Gensch said architecture students find fellowship and pride in the work they accomplish. Even as a freshman, Gensch said he already felt like he was working as a professional.

"It's difficult, but there's a close camaraderie," he said. "It's like going to graduate school."

Instead of spending the first few semesters of his college experience trying to decide on a major, Gensch said he was thankful he could follow his passion.

"I was always lucky," he said. "I knew what I wanted."

Megan McAdoo, senior in psychology and Gensch's girlfriend, said late nights and work weekends can be hard to deal with, but the couple works it out even if she brings her homework to Gensch's studio.

"It definitely can be challenging to make time for each other, but you make it work," she said.

After spending time with Gensch in studio, McAdoo said she has come to respect his friends and classmates' work ethic and desire to succeed.

"The professionalism -- they want to make the best possible work," McAdoo said.

While many of his hours are spent working on projects and assignments, Gensch said he still has time to play intramural sports like flag football, volleyball and water polo as well as attending the Ichthus Christian Fellowship group Thursday nights.

"You just learn to budget your life," he said.

Gensch said his day usually begins at 7:30 a.m., when he gets ready for morning classes.

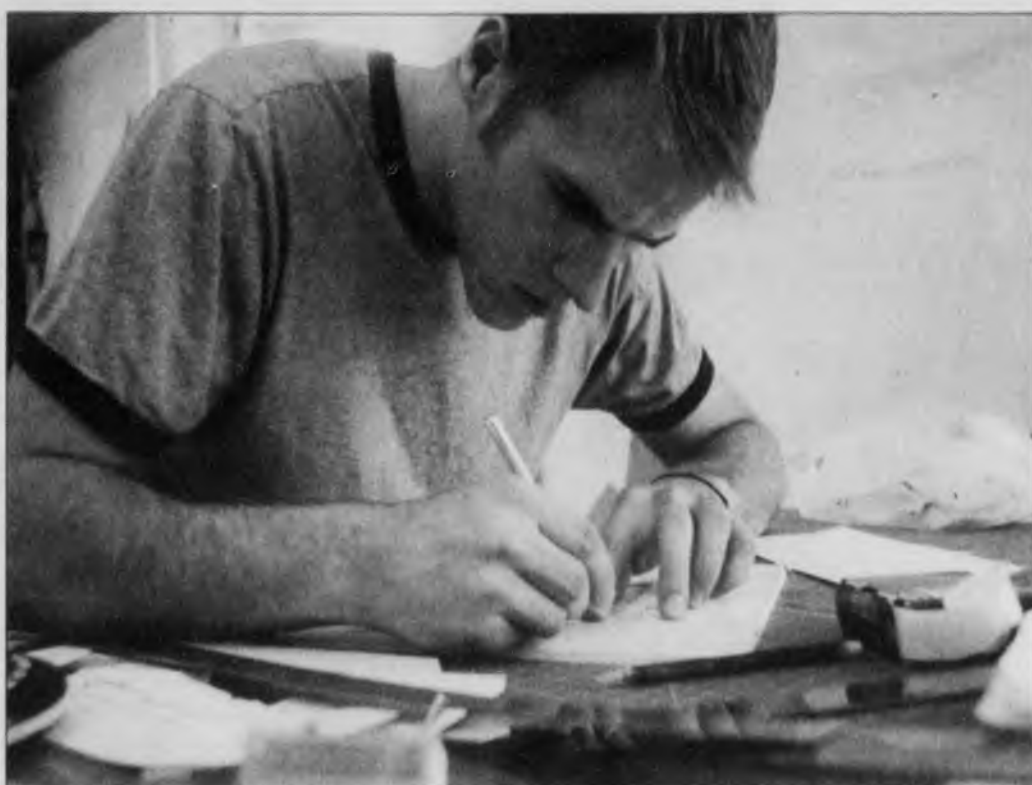

"It's pretty much class to studio to class to studio," Gensch said. "My typical day is back and forth. The bigger the break, the more excited you get because you get more done."

If it's an easy day, Gensch said he's home for dinner, but late nights quickly become second nature.

While he doesn't like to pull all-nighters, if the week is busy, Gensch said he might check out of studio as late as 4 a.m.

"Sometimes I can go nine hours [of sleep] for three days," he said.

Chris Jackson, sophomore in economics and one of Gensch's roommates, said although Gensch usually is in studio every other weekend, he still makes sure to spend time with friends.

Catrina Rawson | COLLEGIAN

Daniel Gensch, junior in architecture, works on an architecture project Sunday afternoon in Seaton Court. Gensch is one of many students who works long hours to complete his degree.

"We definitely find time to hang out," Jackson said. "We go to church and Ichthus and about twice a week we'll cook or throw some meat on the grill and hang out."

Jackson said he often stops in at Gensch's studio to hear about his friends' latest project or idea.

"He loves to talk about it," Jackson said. "I can tell he really loves it."

Whatever time of day, Gensch said studio can be loud with energy or quiet enough to hear a pin drop, with students leaning over their projects.

While he loves the creative process of architecture, Gensch said he occasionally thinks about what life outside studio is like.

"Sometimes I wonder what it would be like to be a business major, studying for a few hours a night," he said. "But it's never been a matter of not wanting to be an architect. I've never thought about dropping out."

Although people might think these students should take a break, Gensch said he and his classmates love their courses, even when it gets tough.

"We take it seriously, but we are having fun," Gensch said. "We're doing what we want to be doing."

Architecture ranks in top 10

By Lacey D. Mackey
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

In keeping with its reputation of excellence, K-State's architecture planning and design programs ranked in the top 10 in a nationwide study conducted by DesignIntelligence and the Design Futures Council, in conjunction with the Almanac of Architecture and Design.

The study surveyed firms nationwide about the quality of employees they have hired from various universities.

Survey says: K-State programs rank among the best.

K-State's bachelor of interior architecture and interior design programs ranked fourth in the survey, while the bachelor of architecture and bachelor of landscape architecture programs placed fifth.

The master of landscape architecture program ranked sixth.

Cassandra Klausing, junior in architecture, said she left her roots in Indiana to join the architecture program at K-State.

"Being in a program that's ranked so high is one of the reasons I came to K-State," Klausing said.

Klausing said she had attended architecture programs at other universities but never found one with the quality at K-State.

"The faculty and the communication between the staff and the students is incredible," she said.

Gita Ramaswamy, interim head of the Department of Apparel, Textiles and Interior Design, said being numbered fourth in the nation was an honor that testified to the hard work of faculty and students.

"For us, it means a lot, because it tells us our students are (some) of the best," Ramaswamy said. "We are preparing very well on the professional level."

The program's reputation, Ramaswamy said, has succeeded from the staff and faculty's commitment to creating a learning environment for excellence.

"They are working together to make every class and studio the best it can be. It's the commitment to excellent design."

Technology has pushed the department to a new level in recent years, Ramaswamy said, making it necessary for students to be more versatile in their abilities.

"All our studios, they use rendering and computer skills, and that makes them very marketable," Ramaswamy said. "We're keeping it really top-notch."

Migette Kaup, associate professor of apparel, textiles, and interior design, said it's nice to hear from someone else that the program is thriving.

"It's an external validation," Kaup said. "It's easy to look at a major and feel like you're preparing graduates. This is someone outside of us with no invested interest."

For students who know about the quality of programs the university has produced in the past, Kaup said she wants people to know design is a vital part of the world today and tomorrow.

"K-State is a great place to study design," she said. "The things that our students are studying will have a huge impact. The young designers of today will be the change-makers of the future."

Remodeled, new shops in the 'Ville

After more than 30 years, Ballard's Sporting Goods, 1218 Moro St., will receive a new look.

"It's going to be more open, and we're going to be more efficient," co-owner Becky Ballard said of the renovation.

"We're really just getting the building back to the original look."

The tin siding will be stripped from the storefront, revealing the original brick foundation.

New tiling and an awning also will be added to the outside of the building, which will make for an original, classic look Ballard said.

"In the '50s and '60s, they covered some neat stuff," she said. "We're excited about what we're going to find."

Ballard's Sporting Goods consists of three separate, connected storefronts.

After the renovation, one storefront will be gutted and sealed off, allowing a new retailer to move in.

In fact, a new vendor has already expressed interest in the property, and while specifics could not be disclosed at this time, the new business will be a good addition to Aggieville, Ballard said.

"When you have renovations and remodeling, it's a positive," said Cheryl Sieben, director of the Aggieville Business Association.

"If you get a new retail business, it's even better."

Renovations on the storefront are expected to be completed by March or April.

The store will remain open throughout the construction, and a sale will take place until Feb. 5.

The overflow of students wanting to watch President Bush Landon Lecture wasn't what was expected.

Craig Johnson, assistant director of operations for the K-State Student Union, said they made provisions for the number of people they thought would show up to view the lecture.

"Our two main areas were Bram Hall and a large screen TV in the dining area," he said. "There was also a big screen in one of the ballrooms, but it wasn't needed."

He said he wasn't able to give an exact number of students who attended, but he would estimate there were less than 200. There were no restrictions on who could come to watch the speech.

"We would have been happy to have as many people that wanted to, come out and watch it, especially those in the community," he said.

There wasn't a lot of publicity, but Johnson said signs and other materials were put up. He said they weren't sure how many While President Bush was speaking and many K-State students were listening, a few classes were still in session.

The Department of Modern Languages and a few other classes were still being held and students were required to attend.

"I would've really liked to have gone," Kelsie Trotman, sophomore in pre-professional business administration, said. "I guess maybe next time, not that the president is going to be here."

Provost M. Duane Nellis said decisions on excused or unexcused absences in classes were up to the individual faculty members, but classes would not be canceled for the day, because of the limited space availability in the stadium. He did ask, in a memo sent out to all faculty, for faculty to be understanding and accommodating to students who did have tickets to the Landon Lecture.

"I think if there is an event that's formal, we should have class," Tanya Cox, Spanish instructor, said. "We followed the university lines that were sent to us. We took into consideration students who wanted to attend."

Some students said they didn't feel they were given the option to go to the Landon Lecture.

"We got a general from the Spanish department saying all Landon Lectures are important, so they can't take precedent," man said.

A memo to students sent out that detailed Modern Languages department's decision to keep attendance mandatory. It stated that tickets were not for students to miss whether they missed class or not, and that they had to get tickets, or else they would miss the actual lecture.

"My mom said: I watch it on TV, but I don't watch it with any State Union," Leslie Pritchard, senior in life science, said. "How often can you be in the same room as him?"

people were going to show up, but were trying to be as prepared as possible. They selected the main areas that would support the most people.

"I think that we did pretty good at meeting the need of people that were interested in watching it," Johnson said.

Josh Hoffman, junior in management, said he had class the day tickets were distributed and did not get to Bramlage Coliseum until 1 p.m. He said the line was too long, so he decided to watch it on television.

He watched the lecture on the television in the K-State Student Union Food Court from 11:30 a.m. to 1:30 p.m. The K-State campus was "pretty dead," but by the end of the speech he said more people were beginning to show up.

He said the turnout of students was pretty big, a little bigger than how many students are there at lunchtime. He said he wished he could have picked up tickets, but he said he realized there may not have been time to have a different approach to ticket sales. He said watching the speech was worth it because he thought Bush's speech was pretty strong.

Andy Soule, bartender at Rock-A-Belly Deli and senior in park management and conservation, said they showed part of the lecture on a few televisions.

"I don't really think people came down just to see the speech, but we did get busy afterward," he said.

Soule said the majority of students that came in were in after the speech was over.

Ulla Stromberg, bartender and head waitress for Rusty's Last Chance Restaurant and Saloon, said they had it playing on all the televisions and on the loud speakers.

She said a decent amount of people were in the bar watching the speech and it was more than any other Monday afternoon. She said there was a large rush after the speech was over, also.

"I will have to say that the crowd got much louder after we were mentioned twice by the President," Stromberg said. "It was really cool to hear our name and it was good public relations."

"It's an unfair advantage for students who don't have as many classes or don't have to go to classes," Prichard said. "I am pretty upset they didn't realize how big of an opportunity this was for students."

Students who didn't even agree with Bush's policies were upset they weren't able to attend.

"I think, for the most part, people who didn't support Bush wanted to go," Emily Melin, junior in mass communications, said. "Even though I don't agree with some of his ideas, he is our president and it is a monumental experience to see him speak."

So, as the president spoke, classes continued and students were upset they didn't get a chance to see him.

"This is a pretty big deal. I mean, the most powerful man in our country is a few feet away but yet so far," Prichard said.

"You're horrible human beings," yelled an unidentified man as he walked past protesters gathered outside of Bramlage Coliseum prior to President Bush's Landon Lecture.

Despite the occasional outburst from the crowd, Shannon Babcock, junior in social work and president of Manhattan National Organization of Women, said things had been calm.

"We've gotten a lot of pictures being taken of us by soldiers. A couple of headshakes ... had an older woman came by and shake her finger, saying, 'Shame on you, shame on you,'" Babcock said.

The protesters gathered to protest the policies of the Bush administration.

The demonstrators had differing messages with protests ranging from alleged breaches of civil liberties, to the environment, education and American Indian rights. The Iraq war was a common theme throughout the protest and also was an issue that Bush addressed during his lecture.

The Topeka-based Westboro Baptist Church also was present at the event.

Steve Drain, one of the Westboro protesters, said the prolonged war, specifically the casualties caused by improvised explosive devices, are punishments sent from God.

"It's the outstretched hand of God, who's punishing his nation that will not obey his voice, that's all there is to it," he said.

Sam Wilson, graduate student in statistics, said his purpose at the protest was to get people to think about the war.

Wilson said he deployed in 2003 with the 3rd Infantry Division and was present when coalition forces first crossed the Iraq border and when they entered Baghdad, Iraq.

"I think more veterans need to come protest the war. We have a unique perspective on what the war causes and the damage it does to human lives," he said.

The protesters received occasional cheers from the crowd, said Megan Challenger, senior in political science and president of Ordinary Women.

"I've seen a lot of people smile and wave," she said.

Though the protesters received encouragement, some in line strongly disagreed with their message.

"I think it's bullshit, when you have a sign that says 'Stop Bush' with (an image) of the Ku Klux Klan. That's just not right," Dan Debes, senior in kinesiology, said.

Others did not express sentiment about the protesters message, but acknowledged the First Amendment rights of the protesters to gather.

"I think they're just speaking the way they feel about it, and I think everybody has the right to speak how they feel about Bush," said Christa Beach, freshman in open-option, who was taking pictures near the protest.

Katerina Kudlackova is not your typical tennis player.

"She's an unusual freshman in the sense of her maturity on the court and the way she handles herself," Coach Steve Bietau said. "You can watch her play, and it's really difficult to tell if she's winning or losing."

"We have some players who go for a couple of years who can't say that."

Kudlackova's maturity has been obvious in her first year at K-State.

She is the No. 100 player in the U.S., as determined by the Intercollegiate Tennis Association for the season-opening Fila Collegiate Tennis Rankings, and she was invited to play in the main draw of the ITA Central Regional tournament in October, an honor typically not earned by freshmen. Kudlackova also began the fall season defeating Arkansas' Vlatka Jovanovic, who, at the time, was the No. 52 player in the country, according to the ITA.

Senior Jessica Simosa said she agreed with Bietau, and she is impressed with how advanced Kudlackova plays for a freshman.

"She's only 18, but you can see the way she acts and plays on the court — she is more mature than most girls," Simosa said. "She knows what she's doing, and she's responsible."

Maryland senior Chris McCray, the team's leading scorer, is the latest player to lose his eligibility to a three-year-old rule that a player maintain his eligibility from fall semester to the spring.

Last week, Wisconsin freshman Marcus Landry was declared ineligible because of the rule. Players are allowed to practice during their ineligible semester. There are different aspects to this rule, such as maintaining a 2.0 grade-point average and passing a minimum of six credit hours in the fall semester. Sources say McCray fell below the six-credit hour rule.

Twelve years ago, Ron Prince made a promise. He told himself that for the rest of his life, he would read a book a week.

"I've been reading a lot," Prince said.

One of Prince's favorite books is "John Adams," a biography of the second president of the United States so instrumental in helping America gain its independence from the British.

Prince's copy sits on a bookshelf behind his desk in his office at the Vanier Football Complex, where he has worked as K-State's new football coach since he was hired Dec. 5.

The cover is worn, the pages are upturned and certain selections of the text are either highlighted in orange or underlined in blue.

At the bottom of the 83rd page, one line stands out.

"Indifference was a quality Adams found difficult to tolerate," the book's author, David McCullough, wrote about the inner workings of Adams' world.

Prince, in much the same way, has set a goal of introducing himself and K-State football to the world as the new leader of the Wildcat program.

In less than two months on the job, Prince has told the K-State story in a variety of ways:

■ On Dec. 12, Prince appeared on ESPN's Cold Pizza to discuss his hiring at K-State and his vision for the program.

■ In a span of three days, Dec. 18-20, Prince went on an eight-stop "Barnstorming Tour" of Kansas to meet and greet Wildcat fans. At each stop, Prince answered questions from fans on a range of topics — from uniforms to schedules, recruiting to coaching.

■ The most recent example took place Saturday, when Prince and a host of potential recruits showed up at the K-State-Missouri basketball game at Bramlage Coliseum. Instead of letting the fans come to him, Prince went into the crowd and spent almost an hour talking with fans and students, taking pictures and signing autographs.

Prince said reaching out to the fanbase is all part of his plan as the new leader of the Wildcat football program.

"That's what you're really doing when you write a great book — you're just trying to tell a story. I think that's what McCullough is trying to do with John Adams," Prince said. "That's what I'm trying to do with the media, with the fans, to recruits. I just want to tell the story of these really interesting people in our program."

◆ ◆ ◆ ◆ ◆

Prince's trek to K-State went through six schools and covered roughly 4,035 miles, but it began less than 20 miles from his office overlooking Snyder Family Stadium.

Born in Omaha, Neb., and adopted by Ernest and Georgeanne Prince of Junction City when he was less than a year old, Prince didn't take up football until he reached high school.

"He wasn't what you'd call a star athlete," said Bobby Whitten, an assistant football coach at Junction City High School when Prince joined the team. "Really, he was more of a beginner once he started. But in time, and going into his last year, he did play more and more and got better."

Prince readily admits he was not good enough to play Division I football out of high school, so he attended Dodge City Community College,

Track team wins 8th-consecutive KSU-KU-MU Triangular

By Chris Carpenter
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The K-State track team extended its winning streak in the KSU-KU-MU Triangular to eight straight, scoring 265 points to beat Kansas (240.5 points) and Missouri (212.5 points) this weekend at the Anschutz Sports Pavilion in Lawrence.

"Quite honestly, it's a meet we feel like we should win," Coach Cliff Rovelto said. "If our kids take care of business, we should win it. Not to take anything from those programs — they have fine athletes — but it's pretty clear that we have more of them."

The Triangular is different than other meets because points scored by women's and men's teams are combined to create one winning school, rather than separating women's and men's scores.

The Wildcats had a strong showing from one side, as the women scored 138 points and won nine of 17 event titles. The men added 127 points, finishing below Kansas (133) by a narrow margin, but their score was more than enough to hand K-State the overall victory.

"We had a solid meet across the board," Rovelto said. "In particular, our seniors stepped up."

Senior Breanna Eveland won her ninth career pole vault with a jump of 13-11 1/4, tying for the best indoor jump in the nation this season with Lacy Janson of Florida State University.

The K-State men won six events, including two each by seniors Christian Smith and Stelios Kapsalis.

Smith won his first event, the mile, with a time of 4:12.20, then added his second win in the 800-meter run with a time 1:50.69. Kapsalis won both the triple jump (50-10) and the long jump (22-9 3/4).

Senior Kyle Lancaster added another high jump victory to his résumé with a jump of 7-4 1/4. Freshman Scott Sellers finished right behind Lancaster with a jump of 7-2 1/2.

The win gave K-State its 15th win in the 17-year history of the meet.

"One of the things we've always taken pride in has been having a complete team," Rovelto said. "In a meet like this, you have to be able to cover all the events, so having quality depth is something you have to strive to do."

"This meet isn't one we hang our hat on — there are more important meets — but this one is still significant."

Dressing up Ramen

Spice up noodles with many flavorful recipes for any meal

By Mark Sibilla
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Ramen noodles undoubtedly play a large role in the diet of the every-day college student.

However, after weeks of ramen consumption, gnawing on the apartment's drywall might seem more appealing than trying to choke down another bowl of soggy, chicken-flavored noodles.

What can a student who is low on income, free time and culinary abilities do to make his or her ramen more pleasing to the palate?

Through various books and Internet sites, one can find many creative ways to improve the taste and quality of ramen noodles.

Melissa Colbert, junior in dietetics at Johnson County Community College, said she has familiarized herself with "The Official Ramen Homepage," a Web site started in 1995 by Matt Fischer while he was studying computer science at the University of Missouri-Rolla. The Web site has since acquired more than 300 recipes involving ramen noodles as the starting ingredient.

Colbert said she eats ramen only a couple times a month, but since discovering the Web site, she plans to eat more.

Burroughs' new novel entertaining, quick read

"Magical Thinking: True Stories"

★★★★★

Book review by Alex Peak

"Magical Thinking: True Stories" is Augusten Burroughs' fourth book and sequel to "Running with Scissors," a story depicting the debauchery he called his childhood.

"Magical Thinking" is a memoir composed of more than 25 short, and true, stories about his life.

Burroughs, an author whose books are frequent residents of the New York Times best-seller list, has written several books about his life experiences.

His writing style and voice is certainly comparable to that of David Sedaris. Although he hasn't developed quite the sense of humor as Sedaris, the book still proves to be nothing short of laugh-out-loud entertaining.

Most of the book is saturated in the hilarity of Burroughs' life encompassing his coming of age, overcoming alcoholism, sexuality and dating experiences.

Also, a significant part of the book seems to be a devotion to his partner, Dennis, with quotes like: "What's painful and wonderful about loving somebody is loving their small things, like the way he is able to smile when he sips his wine, the way his hands fall down at this sides, fingers slightly cupped, or the way he is conducting the orchestra on the radio."

Each chapter of his book is a different humorous anecdotal episode. Some of the content includes dating an undertaker and attempts at trying to rid his apartment of a "rat/thing."

In reference to the "rat/thing" creature, he explains the process by which he had to go through to lose the rodent.

"And like a campy cartoon housewife, I climbed on top of the sink, crouching under the ceiling and scorching my balding head on the light bulb on the vanity. I am over six feet tall, so this was a very sad sight."

One of the funniest chapters involves a story of an obsessive-compulsive, money-mongering, longitidinally-challenged elderly housekeeper. Not only does she take it upon herself to rearrange Burroughs' apartment and furniture, she also charges him ridiculously high house-cleaning bills.

Overall, the book is an amusing, quick read. Few authors are able to humanize themselves this much through their writing. It's a book Burroughs manages to make relatable to everyone.

"Magical Thinking" was released and his next book, "Possible Side Effects," and is scheduled to release in May.

KUDLACKOVA | Calm demeanor helps tennis player stay focused on game, combat homesickness can be attributed to her poise on the court. The psychology major rarely panics under stress, Bietau said.

"A lot of players, when you put pressure on them, will just go for it and hope it goes in," Bietau said. "She understands that there is always a safe place to put the ball, and she's usually looking for that place. More often than not, she finds it."

Her athleticism and depth to her game, combined with her calm demeanor, make her a difficult draw, Bietau said.

"She does so many things with the ball," Bietau said. "It's a bit unconventional, particularly in women's tennis, to have so much variety in her shots and have the knack to use them the way she does."

Kudlackova never had a coach when she began playing at eight years old. Since her time at K-State, she has proven to be coachable and hungry for knowledge, Bietau said.

"When you have players who are constantly fed information and are normally used to more than they can process, they don't handle coaching the same way," Bietau said. "She's really had to fight for what she has and because of that her mind is pretty open."

In turn, it is coaching and conditioning that has helped her game the most since coming to K-State, the Czech Republic native said.

"At home ... I played by myself and with my peers," Kudlackova said. "Now I'm getting help so I'm seeing improvement."

Kudlackova added that playing collegiate tennis in the United States has allowed her to get an education.

"If I would stay at home, I could not study and play tennis," Kudlackova said.

New Mexico, Texas and Missouri also recruited Kudlackova. She chose K-State because she knew K-State sophomores Olga Klimova and Tereza Prochazkova from tournaments back home.

"They told me they liked it here, and I didn't know anyone from the other schools so I chose to come here," she said.

Kudlackova said she is homesick a lot, but playing tennis allows her to clear her head. Food and family are the two things she misses most.

Homesickness aside, she said she is on a mission to win as much as possible.

That mission is an accomplishable one, Bietau said.

"I haven't seen too many that have the whole combination of things she has," Bietau said. "For her it's just part of the plan."

K-State Coach Ron Prince speaks to the media at the December press conference where he was announced as K-State's head coach.

and in 1990, transferred to Appalachian State in Boone, N.C.

He played two seasons for the Mountaineers and helped Appalachian State to a Southern Conference championship and a berth in the NCAA I-AA playoffs as a senior in 1991.

After graduating in 1992, Prince returned to Dodge City to begin his coaching career, serving as a volunteer assistant coach working with offensive tackles and tight ends.

"It's not like I played at a big-time, blue-chip school or was some Parade All-American or went and played in the pros," Prince said. "I literally started out coaching at Dodge City living in Coach (Tim) McCarty's house on a cot, working two jobs trying to learn how to coach, and I just came up through the ranks."

Coming up through the ranks entailed stops at Alabama A&M, South Carolina State, James Madison and Cornell, until he got a major break in 2000. Virginia coach Al Groh hired Prince as his offensive line coach, and later, as the offensive coordinator.

But, Prince said, through all those jobs, his mind kept wandering back to Kansas.

"This job at K-State, I've been preparing for my whole life," he said. "I used to sit down on the 35-yard line down on the closed end of the stadium and watch the games. I grew up here. This is my team."

Whitten said looking back, he could see the coach in Prince start to develop in high school.

"He was trying to learn as much of the game as possible," Whitten said. "He was one of those who had his nose in the playbook. I didn't know at the time, and I don't think any of the other coaches at the time knew that he wanted to get into coaching."

"Ron was going to excel in something big."

Over the course of his travels, Prince created his own masterpiece in the form of a book, or journal, of his experiences as a collegiate coach.

When he first got into coaching, Prince began writing the daily experiences of being a football coach in a notebook.

"There are things I've been adding to it and things I've seen other coaches do," he said. "In situations that have come up, I'd write the situation down and then at the end, I'd write that maybe I'd do it differently."

"For 14 years, I'd been thinking about what I wanted to do to be a head coach."

Now that Prince has started his newest chapter of his life

"Everyday, I want to make sure we are establishing that we're trying to get closer to that goal that you can never attain, which is perfection."

Ron Prince FOOTBALL COACH

— the one that includes taking over for Bill Snyder, who turned K-State from doormat to dominant -- Prince has some ways to rejuvenate a Wildcat program coming off two straight losing seasons.

"We're not here with any kinds of concepts that are contrary to what Coach Snyder believed in," Prince said. "We're just looking for maybe a little bit different approach."

But some of the changes are downright drastic for K-State fans used to Snyder's airtight policies surrounding his program, such as an open-door media policy and assistant coaches being allowed to use handheld Blackberries, a sort of computer/cell phone/electronic datebook.

One immediate benefit for K-State students involves Prince's open-practice policy.

Spring practice will consist of Monday, Wednesday, Friday and Saturday practices, with the Monday and Wednesday practices closed and the Saturday practices open to all fans and the media.

But the Friday practices will be different, as only K-State students, faculty and certain donors will be allowed to watch practice.

"I really want the players to make that identification with the faculty and students here," Prince said. "I want it to be a tradition in spring ball where students come over and bring their lunch, lay out, get a tan, whatever it is they want to do."

But Prince has a simple request for the students in return come football season.

"I'm going to ask that the students come in purple body paint and purple hair and be loud and really have a great time," he said. "We want to be as positive as we can, but really come and be a part of the game."

Quarterback Allan Evridge said the increased exposure is exciting since the Wildcats have somewhat fallen out of the national spotlight.

"I think it'll be good for the program and let it be more visible to the world," Evridge said. "We've missed two bowl games, so we've been out of the nation's eye the last two seasons. It will be new though."

It's all part of Prince's plan to make sure people, especially students, have a vested interest in his program, he said.

"I want people to come and be a part of the university and the community here and really feel like they've come and joined something bigger than themselves," he said. "I want that for our students, I want that for our players, and I want the students to see our players as people who really feel a connection with them."

Prince has another book he lists as a favorite: "Good to be Great: Why Some Companies Make the Leap ... and Others Don't," by Jim Collins.

"Collins basically offers the view that settling for being good prohibits a company, organization or person from being great," Prince said. "Good is the enemy of great."

For K-State's newest football coach, being good just isn't good enough.

"Every day, I want to make sure we are establishing that we're trying to get closer to that goal that you can never attain, which is perfection," Prince said. "We're going to be relentless in our pursuit of the Big 12 North title. We have to educate our people, and we have to acknowledge our position and responsibilities we have in big-time football at a big-time university."

"As long as we are doing those things every day, then we should never be the same team a year from now as we are right now."

know what they're talking about, and that's the commanders on the ground in Iraq," he said.

Bush said he believes Iraq will be like World War II-era Japan. He said Japan once considered America to be its sworn enemy, but the two countries have become allies.

He cited his talks with Japanese Prime Minister Junichiro Koizumi as evidence of this improvement over time.

"As you study history, I want you to watch the effect of freedom on the world," he said. "... this isn't America's gift to the world, it is a universal gift to the world, and people want to be free."

The president then turned to two political issues he considered important. The first was the Patriot Act, which was set to expire toward the end of 2005 but was extended, with its expiration now set for Feb. 3.

"I'd like to remind you the Patriot Act is set to expire but threats to the United States aren't set to expire," he said.

The second issue was the wiretapping of telephone calls between the United States and foreign countries by the National Security Agency. Bush defended this practice, which was uncovered by The New York Times in a story last month.

The president said the wiretaps are meant to allow the U.S. to listen in on conversations between known al-Qaeda members and persons in the United States.

"If they're making phone calls into the United States, we need to know why," he said.

Normally, the NSA is able to listen to such communications after obtaining a court-warrant, but the administration has allowed it to skip the court. Several Democrats, including former Vice President Al Gore, have said this is illegal.

Bush said this practice is necessary for national security and pointed out that he had briefed several members of Congress on it, including Roberts.

"If I wanted to break the law, why was I briefing Congress?" he asked.

Once the lecture ended, the president took questions from several members of the audience.

One person brought up the issue of the Japanese ban on American Beef, which cuts off a major market for Kansas ranchers. Another asked about his relationship with British Prime Minister Tony Blair.

However, none of the inquiring audience members had quite the effect of Tara Mossa, graduate student in public health, who chose not to ask a question. Instead, she ecstatically praised Bush for the war in Iraq, her original country, where several members of her family live.

The speech had political star power aplenty. Gov. Kathleen Sebelius sat with Sen. Pat Roberts and Sam Brownback, R-Kan., on the stage behind Bush. Gen. Richard Myers, former chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff and K-State alumnus, was in the audience.

Reps. Jim Ryun, R-Kan.; Dennis Moore, D-Kan.; and Jerry Moran, R-Kan., were present. Rep. Todd Tiahrt, R-Kan., was not at the speech because he was busy working toward being elected to the post of majority whip, his Communication Director Chuck Knapp said.

Some lesser-known government employees also attended.

Samuel Jones, a regional administrator for the U.S. Small Business Administration based out of Kansas City, Mo., sat with his daughter and took pictures of the scene before and during the lecture. He said the photos were likely to help her with a class assignment.

"For some reason, we landed tickets on the front row," he said. "I don't know what it is, but we're definitely grateful."

Bush appearance generates publicity for community

By Holly Smith
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The $50,000 spent in preparation for the President Bush Landon Lecture could be considered a bargain for K-State.

Charles Reagan, chairman of the Landon Lecture Series, said the publicity generated from the lecture is worth millions.

"The amount of publicity Bush's appearance brought the university far outweighs the estimated $50,000 spent,"

Reagan said. "When people turned on the news or looked in the paper they saw images of President Bush - with Kansas State University in the backdrops."

The event was not only a "terrific form of public relations," it also provided an immediate indication that K-State is a major university, Reagan said.

"Think about how much it would cost to buy a full-page advertisement in the Kansas City Star," Reagan said. "The small amount of money spent bought huge amounts of favorable publicity for the university."

Reagan said he estimated the president's visit generated around $5 million in publicity. The estimate is not based on factual evidence, but a prediction of how much the event benefited K-State monetarily, Reagan said.

The $50,000 spent on preparation went toward lighting and the stage for the speech.

mass communications, said the publicity showed K-State as a cultured university.

"The fact that K-State got him to speak really says something about the university," Paulson said. "It showed that we have an impressive lecture series, and it not only portrayed K-State positively, it also showed that Bush realizes that he needs to speak to young people. It showed he realizes that young people are an important part of society's future."

Dale Herspring, professor of political science, said media coverage portrayed K-State as a school with more going on than just sports.

"The publicity definitely taught a lot of people that we do more than just play football," Herspring said.

Herspring said the specific results from the publicity are hard to predict but that the repercussions seem solely positive.

"The discipline of the students was impressive," Her-spring said. "People disagreed with President Bush but still acted respectfully."

Herspring also said the increased media attention could influence more students to attend K-State.

"The President didn't go to KU, Nebraska, or Oklahoma - he came here," Herspring said. "This shows people who are looking at colleges that K-State is a significant and special institution. This event took the obscure place of Kansas State and put it on the front page."

Committee advances Alito to Senate

By Jesse J. Holland
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON, D.C. - The Judiciary Committee favorably recommended Samuel Alito's Supreme Court nomination to the full Senate on a party-line vote Tuesday, ensuring prospects the conservative jurist will join the high court bench.

All 10 Republicans voted for Alito, while all eight Democrats voted against him. The partisan vote was almost preordained, with 15 of the 18 senators announcing their votes even before the committee's session began.

The full Senate expects to take a final vote on Alito's nomination before the end of the week. That vote also is expected to follow along party lines, with only one Democrat - Ben Nelson of Nebraska - coming out so far in support of Alito. Republicans hold the balance of power in the Senate 55-44, with one independent.

Senate Republicans say Alito is a good choice for the nation's highest court.

"Like America's founders, Judge Alito clearly believes in self-government, that the people and not judges should make law, and that judges have an important role but must know and stay in their proper place," Sen. Orrin Hatch, R-Utah, said.

But Democrats are fretting that the 55-year-old jurist, and former lawyer for the Reagan administration, will swing the court to the right and help overturn precedent-setting decisions like Roe v. Wade, the Supreme Court's abortion rights case, although he refused to talk about that decision at his confirmation hearing.

"He still believes that the Constitution does not protect a right to an abortion, but does not want to tell the American people because he knows how unpopular that view is," Sen. Charles Schumer, D-N.Y., said.

Said the White House in a statement after the vote: "The negative tone, relentless attacks and distortion of Judge Alito's career confirmed what we already knew from the hearings: Judge Alito had an open mind but the

A growing operation

KSU Gardens to blossom into 19 acres, complete with renovated conservatory

By Brandon R. Gonzalez
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The plants at KSU Gardens aren't the only things growing on campus. The gardens themselves will be expanding.

Before present-day design plans, William Winslow, professor of landscape architecture and regional community planning, along with a group of select students, drew up expansion plans for the gardens in the early 1990s.

"When I saw there was going to be a push in fundraising for the gardens, I got a bit more critical of the old plans and thought they could be improved upon," Winslow said.

For the new plans Winslow sought the expertise of former K-State students, and in 2001, alumni from the Mesas Design group in Dallas and The Clark-Enersen Partners of Lincoln, Neb., donated $150,000 in design work for the expansion of the gardens.

"They put in a lot of personal time and a lot of extra hours on their part," Winslow said. "The plans began in November and finished in late May."

While Winslow's original plans included expanding the garden to 12 acres, the new plans will expand the garden to 19 acres and will cost $62 million.

Scott McElwain, director of KSU Gardens, said the $62 million contributes to items such as the limestone walls.

"Hardscape is expensive, but what we're putting in here isn't temporary but going to last," McElwain said.

The new plans include two more phases, with the current garden as the completed phase one.

Phase two, also known as the Formal Gardens, will be constructed north of the conservatory.

"With phase two, there's going to be

Kansas attorney general to speak on campus tonight

By Hannah Crippen
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Kansas Attorney General Phill Kline will speak at 7 tonight in Forum Hall.

The K-State chapter of College Republicans and the Union Program Council are cosponsoring the event.

Ben Davis, junior in political science and pre-law, invited Kline to K-State.

Davis said he wanted Kline to come and clear up some accusations against the attorney general that were brought up during the pro-abortion play, "Words of Choice," at K-State in the fall.

A panel discussion that took place during the play attacked decisions Kline had made regarding abortion records.

Davis said the panel members, which included some faculty members, were unprofessional and misinformed about what Kline was trying to do.

Kline was not there to defend himself, and Davis said he would like Kline to set the record straight and be available to talk about other issues.

Ben Hopper, UPC program adviser, said Kline will have a white board next to him on stage, and people in the audience can suggest topics and issues they would like to discuss.

Kline will write the topics on the board and address them in his speech.

Hopper said he thinks it will be interesting and is glad to have someone of Kline's caliber to speak with K-State students.

Davis said he looks forward to an informative speech and presentation.

"He will take any question you throw out and give you a great and straightforward answer," Davis said. "How often do you get to see an attorney general speak?"

New arcade, mini golf center coming to Plaza West

By Logan C. Adams
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

A new business featuring an arcade and miniature golf, with the possibility of a skating rink in the future, will arrive in Manhattan.

Mark Samarra, president of S & S Development Inc., said he hopes to have Time-Out Corner open by spring break.

Samarra said he wants to obtain a building permit soon and to start construction as soon as possible, which would take about four weeks.

He said the business will be in the building between Valentino's and El Cazador Authentic Mexican Food & Cantina in Plaza West Shopping Center. It will take up the 12,100 square feet of available space.

Samarra said he started this project because there is a demand for places in Manhattan that are family-oriented. "We just want everybody to be able to be with their families," he said.

The facility will feature a simplistic rain-forest theme. It also will have a small concession stand, three birthday rooms and be wheelchair-accessible, Samarra said.

Samarra said he has wanted to start the business for several years. His nephew, Darren Holladay, will manage it.

If things go well, Samarra said, Time Out Corner will add a roller-skating rink by the end of the year, which would be built onto the back of the existing building.

Time Out Corner will have an arcade featuring more than 50 electronic games and an 18-hole, indoor miniature golf course.

"We have some pretty challenging holes," Holladay said.

Time Out Corner, a new business coming to Manhattan, is tentatively scheduled to open before spring break in Plaza West Shopping Center. It will feature an arcade and miniature golf course.

Web site provides critiques for writers

By Kelsey Childress
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The Heel Press, www.heelpress.com, an up-and-coming Web site, is providing many opportunities for college writers who are looking to improve upon their skills.

This free, online community of college students and young alumni could help writers develop their skills, make connections with others, and read and critique others' works.

"It's a great venue for experimentation with the craft of writing," said Angela Joy Natividad, University of California Berkeley student in mass communications.

"You can find out firsthand what others think of your work. You receive valuable critiques. Perhaps most importantly, you get the unique pleasure of feeling your work is out there deploying your thoughts into the public discourse — something once limited to those who are formally published."

According to a press release, The Heel Press began in January 2005 by two Berkeley students.

"I started the Heel during my senior year at UC-Berkeley with my former roommate, Nick [Miller]," Jesse Young, one of the creators, said. "We brainstormed for a couple days, skipped a bunch of classes, and within a few weeks, the site was launched."

Since its conception, more than 400 writers who represent an estimated 70 colleges, have joined the site and submitted works for critique.

The majority of the students are from the University of California, Los Angeles or UC-Berkeley, but others could have found out about the site from members or invitations on The Facebook.com and Web blogs.

"The majority of our writers are from the east and west coast (California, New York, etc.)," Young said.

"There haven't been too many from KSU, but we would like to see more writers from there."

Young said they want at least one writer from every university in the United States.

"We're almost there," he said. "We only have a few more thousand schools left."

Young said the Heel Press is trying to get more students at a variety of colleges in universities to join so there can be a variation in opinions, experiences and types of writing that is published.

As for students at K-State and the University of Kansas, there have been no published articles from either school.

Many instructors believe it's a good place to gain experience.

"I think the Web site is a good idea," Christina Hauck, associate professor of English, said.

"I'd encourage young writers to submit their stuff — find out if there's an audience for them."

Once a person has become a member, they are able to submit articles to get published on the Heel Press Web site.

There are three tiers in the voting system. Fellow members of the Web site vote whether or not a piece should get published.

Even though this process is very thorough, the basis of the Heel Press is the voting system and the ability to give suggestions to fellow writers.

"It's all college students," said Obio Ntia, Chinese and religious studies student at Hamilton College in New York.

"It's a good community. People encourage each other. It's not too pretentious, or even well-known."

When a piece of writing is published, members are able to comment on it.

Those comments are, in turn, visible to other members and the writer of the piece.

As for the future of the online publication, it really depends on where those managing the Heel Press choose to go with it, Natividad said.

"If they develop a way to broaden its reach, the Heel could become a powerful means of discovering the brightest and strongest new journalistic and literary talents in the written world today," Natividad said.

Young said he hopes a print version will soon be available.

"As for publishing an offline version, we will pursue this once we find the right resources," Young said.

Local communities receive housing grants

By Lola Shrimplin
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Junction City and Clay Center, Kan., were among six Kansas communities awarded federal funding from the national Community Development Block Grant program.

About $1.7 million in grants was awarded to the Kansas communities of Belleville, Clay Center, Clyde, Graham County, Junction City and Miltonvale.

"The improvement is going to be pretty significant and pretty noticeable," Rod Barnes, city manager of Junction City, said.

Junction City applied for $400,000 in housing grants through CDBG, and the city was awarded $316,000.

The grant will be used to rehabilitate 20 homes in the Buffalo Soldier Memorial Pawnee Park area, Barnes said. The homes were constructed in 1941 and were built to house the Buffalo Soldiers at Fort Riley.

Forty houses exist in the neighborhood, and Junction City only received enough funding to upgrade 20 houses because of the federal government cutting funding, Barnes said.

Although the housing originally was built for soldiers, it is no longer restricted to soldiers and their families, Barnes said.

The funds were granted to communities which showed specified needs and the ability to assist low to moderate income homeowners with rehabilitating the housing, Linda Hunsicker, western Kansas field representative, and head of the housing program with the Kansas Department of Commerce.

"The competition was very stiff," Hunsicker said.

There were 33 applications for the grants, and out of those 33 communities, the field was narrowed down to 12.

Those 12 communities received site visits, and awards were granted to the top six contenders.

While Manhattan did not receive a grant through CDBG, it was not because the city is not eligible, Karen Davis, Director of Community Development, said.

"We just didn't apply this year," Davis said.

The grant program is very competitive, and Manhattan had already received a grant from another program, Davis said.

The HOME Investment Partnerships Program is a federal program offered through the Department of Housing and Urban Development.

Manhattan was awarded $300,000 in funds, and the money will be used to rehabilitate homes occupied by low income families.

The money will put about 20 years of life back into the houses, Davis said.

"It's the same thing Junction City is doing," Davis said. "It's just a different grant program."

City Commission discusses controversial aquatic facility

By Logan C. Adams
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The Manhattan City Commission took a step toward building a new aquatic facility in Manhattan on Tuesday evening.

The commission met with the Parks and Recreation Advisory Board for a work session at City Hall. The two bodies watched a presentation by Dennis Reynolds, a representative of RDG Planning and Design.

Reynolds presented several preliminary designs for building a recreation and aquatic facility with indoor and outdoor components. The potential sites for the design were at CiCo Park, City Park, the south downtown redevelopment project and Griffith Park.

Mayor Ed Klimek said the commission would like to get STAR bonds to pay for such a facility, which may be a possibility if it is built in the south downtown area along with other downtown redevelopment construction. STAR bonds are money from the state government that pay for the development of commercial areas and are paid off by sales tax revenue collected in the developed area.

Many Manhattan residents criticized the City Park option.

Allen Nesbitt, a Manhattan resident who lives near City Park, told the commission that many of the facilities already in the park get heavy use and that it would be bad for the city to replace them with an aquatic center.

Sam Margolies, 4, of Manhattan, brought a sign to protest putting the facility in City Park. It read, "Save my playground please."

His mother, Sheila Hochhauser, said he likes to play at the playground that could be replaced with the aquatic facility. Hochhauser said it was Sam's idea to make the sign.

No real decision was made during the meeting, but Klimek told Sam near the end of the meeting he wouldn't lose his playground. He said this is because even if the facility takes the location of the playground, the master plan for City Park is likely to include a playground.

Time to retire

Chairs in Eisenhower Hall need replacement

I have been down in a basement for 20 years.

On any given day, I have five students or more sitting on me for hours at a time.

KELSEY CHILDRESS

When I was first placed in the wonderful building known as Eisenhower Hall, I enjoyed all the butts and all the sitting. But now, I am tired. So are my friends.

We, the wooden desk chairs, occupy most of the classrooms in the building. Surely many students have listened to us creak in agony and grind our parts in a public outcry for retirement.

I understand I was built for the students at K-State. I have carried out a great purpose: allowing students to sit and learn about fiction writing, poetry, American literature, and so much more. However, my time here at K-State has come to an end.

I know replacing my brothers and myself is no easy task, but something must be done. Just like people, chairs get old and cranky, too.

At first, a few joints squeaked, but now our pains are so numerous that we cannot go on much longer.

As long as students are moving during class, we will be shrieking, so the professors will take notice and remember our pain and how badly we need to be replaced.

They have to speak loudly to be heard over our protests. Students must sit perfectly still in order to keep us quiet, which is an impossible task.

Faculty must recognize that we will not be contained.

We have more relatives in other buildings, and we have banded together to be so loud that we are impossible to ignore.

Classes will be disrupted for as long as we are still being used.

We are sick of being stuck in a classroom day and night. We are ready to retire and be put out to Chair Pasture, where wood polish streams flow and new legs grow from the trees.

We have served the university well; surely there are some funds that could be raised that would allow us to go to a better place.

Currently, there is great excitement between my brothers and myself.

After years of complaining, good news and fortune has possibly come for us. There are whispers of a movement by some of the English professors who finally have decided to listen to the great chairs of K-State. They are proclaiming that we need to be replaced by younger, less noisy chairs so classes can be conducted in a civil manner.

While this is a very good idea, there is only one problem – apparently it is very costly to replace all of us here in Eisenhower Hall, much less our brothers in other buildings, where the need often is just as great.

We cannot understand how there is plenty of money available for landscaping and other less important vanities around the campus, but when it comes to providing students with a comfortable (and quiet) atmosphere, suddenly the purse strings tighten.

We no longer can stand to be more than 20 years old and still expected to be as efficient as we were in our golden days.

Please help us by letting the faculty know how much we need to be set free.

Kelsey Childress is a sophomore in English Literature and Spanish. Please send your comments to opinion@pub.ksu.edu.

Columnist satirically recalls Bush's lecture

Dear Kody:

Last week, the Spanish department declared that all absences for President Bush's Landon Lecture are unexcused.

KODY COOPER

Because attendance is mandatory under threat of Department of Spanish Inquisition, I didn't dare skip. Consequently, I missed my once-in-a-lifetime opportunity to see the sitting President of the United States. The most powerful man in the world spoke at K-State, and I was in Spanish class.

The entire period, I could hear explosive laughter and cheers echoing all the way from Bramlage to Eisenhower. As you can imagine, I'm quite distraught.

I was just wondering if you could use your superhuman writing powers to recount what happened and explain the Spanish Department's actions. Muchas gracias. – Moping in Manhattan

Dear Moping:

The Spanish Department was right to declare all Bush-related absences unexcused. They were only following their own absence policy bylaw, which reads:

"No warmongering machismo American monarchs named George II will be recognized as legitimate lecturers by this department. However, students are encouraged to attend any lectures given by benevolent Latin American virtuosos named Fidel or Hugo."

Besides, don't you realize the infinite importance of Spanish class?

As for the event, simply getting in was a task. It was so tempting to stop and ponder such enlightened protester signs as "Gays Cause Global Warming."

Wow, I never knew homosexuals gave off more carbon dioxide than heterosexuals.

Do they breathe more or something?

Is "Brokeback Mountain" a documentary on climate change? (No wonder that nature-hater-dictator has never seen it.)

Protesters were one thing – security was another.

At every entrance, the Bush Imperial Guard vilely invaded students' privacy.

Upon entrance, all students' cell phones were immediately confiscated and bugged with Bush's spy devices. Shocked, I queried an Imperial Guard:

"Hey, I thought Bush only eavesdropped on international calls to al-Qaeda terrorists. What gives?"

The Imperial Guard chuckled:

"No, you've got it all wrong. That's just a cover for the president's true motive – Federal tabulation of all 'American Idol' text message votes this season. Ever since the fraudulent victory of Reuben Studdard, the president has been diligent."

I was confused: "American Idol, sir? Does the president really care about such meaningless domestic activity?"

The Guard retorted:

"Meaningless? Why, without 'American Idol,' we would be without the vocal goodness of luscious lyricists like Clay Aiken."

He made a good point, but some students still refused to relinquish their cells. They forced the Imperial Guard's hand.

These unlucky souls were then arrested and interrogated at the grossly hideous and insidiously inhumane Manhattan torture facility – Kramer Dining Center.

Those of us fortunate enough to make it to our seats were awestruck by the stage.

A red white and blue tapestry reading "Hail King Bush" back-dropped a gold-laden throne.

Bush's diamond-encrusted scepter doubled as a microphone.

As for his speech, I actually forgot everything he said.

However, I do remember the crowd's resounding verbal addendum: "Long live the King!"

Nice question about "Brokeback Mountain." I mean, who really does that?

I'd just like to remind everyone that we freaking beat KU and that's awesome.

I just want to say to all the people walking across Claflin at about 7:30 on Monday night, right by Haymaker: Try using the crosswalk and maybe you won't get hit.

If the Broncos would have had the Burger King, they would have won the AFC Championship.

I feel so sorry for Bush's speech writers. I mean if I had to give them a speech like Bush gave today, I would have failed speech. I mean, it's probably really well written, but given in his hands; what you got is what you heard yesterday.

New York Times: We are not Manhattanville, this is Manhattan.

So Mr. President, what do you think about ranchers? Have you seen "Brokeback Mountain"?

Someone should inform the New York Times that we are Manhattan, Kan., not Manhattanville, Kan.

Manhattanville, Kan., where's that? I've never been there.

Hey Bush, you done good kid, you done good.

I can't believe you didn't print my comment about David Bowie, geez.

Hangout spots offer relaxation

By Jessi Hernandez
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

With classes back in full swing, K-State students might find themselves spending more time on campus, in and out of classes.

Whether students spend their time between classes studying or just chatting with friends, there are a lot of hangout spots on the K-State campus.

Popular spots include the K-State Student Union and Hale Library.

One such area is Chillie Willie's, the ice cream, coffee and soda shop located on the second floor of the Union.

On any given day this area is busy with students studying, eating or hanging out with friends.

"I'm a freshman and I live off campus, so I like to come here to see people and to eat," Angela Sims, freshman in English, said. "Plus, there are computers here, so it's great because you can come here, eat and work on a computer, which you can't do in the library."

Erica Glover, freshman in hotel and restaurant management, said she likes Chillie Willie's as a hangout spot because a lot of her friends hang out there as well.

"Some of my friends don't have cars, but since a lot of them come here I can stop by and check on them, see if they need rides," Glover said.

Hale Library is another place where students can gather.

"One of the places I hang out is the library," Kala Raglin, junior in architecture, said. "The library is poppin'."

Students also can be found on the second floor of Hale, where there are several large tables, and the noise level is less regulated.

Another popular spot in Hale is the 24-hour study area on the ground floor.

"I come here, mostly to study," Yueping Cao, graduate student in chemistry, said of the 24-hour area. "It's usually pretty quiet, a good place to study. I sometimes come here to read."

Nick Appino, sophomore in math, works on a homework assignment in the 24-hour room of Hale Library Monday evening. Hale is a popular spot on campus where students study and hang out.

Christopher Hanewinkel | COLLEGIAN

Other areas on campus frequented as hangout spots depend more on the preference or status of the individual student — those who live in the residence halls can choose to head back to their rooms between classes, and those with particularly demanding majors often spend their time in their department.

"I'm in architecture, so I spend the majority of my time in Seaton," Raglin said. "I like go to the Union to eat because it's so close, but for the most part of my day, I'm in studio."

Where a student hangs out depends on what they like, Sims said.

Some students choose to hang out in places because of convenience of location; others may gather where there are computers, resources or food.

"For me, friends make the spot," Sims said.

Local agents, online vistas may help with Spring Break travel

By Wendy Haun
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Although it is still January, travel agents are encouraging students to plan their Spring Break trips.

"The sooner they book, the better because things do fill up," Mary Gule, travel agent for Jade Travel, said. "We're willing to try to book for customers until the last minute because you never know until you try."

However, the urge to book a hotel at the last minute could have bad consequences, Gule said.

"There are more options and lower prices the earlier they book," she said. "The hotels located in the best areas of town will fill up faster and there will be lower airline prices (if you book early)."

Gule said the most popular destinations are Cancun, Mexico; South Padre Island, Texas; and Panama City, Fla.

Although Jade Travel, 555 Poyntz Ave., does not have a routing program to assist with driving directions, a spokeswoman said the company can assist with travel preparations in other ways.

"We help with people who are wanting hotels or accommodations once they get there," she said.

for AAA in Topeka, said advance planning is key to a low travel rate.

"Planing a year in advance is a good tip because the airplanes get depleted first," she said. "It's hard for college kids who are looking for a cheap deal because the plane fares go up."

Swartz said another thing to consider is group travel.

"If you are planning to travel with a group, ask about a discount," she said. "Many places give cheaper group rates."

Swartz said students should be cautious of traveling scams, especially when buying online.

"Be cautious about packages online, because if someone drops out, it's difficult to cancel," she said. "There can also be hidden costs in online booking, especially with departure and return taxes that they don't tell you about until you get to the airport."

Working with a travel agent has its benefits, Swartz said.

"You'll be sure you know where you're going and if there's any trouble with the airlines in the way of delays or cancellations, you'll have a human link to go through," she said. "Going online is relatively safe for airline tickets, but do it in advance, especially if you're going out of the country, and have an agent so that you have an actual person to deal with."

WASHINGTON, D.C. — Senators lambasted the Bush administration on Tuesday for failing to heed devastating predictions from a hurricane preparedness test that began a year before Hurricane Katrina slammed into the Gulf Coast.

The top Democrat on the Senate Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs Committee also accused the White House of trying to block or delay the panel's inquiry into the government's sluggish response to Katrina.

The preparedness exercise that began in July 2004, dubbed Hurricane Pam, warned that a Category 3 storm would overwhelm the New Orleans area with flood waters, killing up to 60,000 people and destroying buildings and roads. State and federal officials were concluding Pam's findings when Katrina, an actual Category 4 storm, roared ashore on Aug. 29.

"As a dry run for the real thing, Pam should have been a wake-up call that could not be ignored," said Sen. Susan Collins, R-Maine, chair of the Senate committee's examination of Pam's findings at a Tuesday hearing. "Instead, it is apparent that a more appropriate name for Pam should have been 'Cassandra' — the mythical prophet who warned of disasters but whom no one believed."

Sen. Joe Lieberman, D-Conn., said Pam gave the Federal Emergency Management Agency and the Homeland Security Department "explicit notice" that a catastrophic storm in New Orleans would require urgent aid from Washington to state and local response officials.

"But despite these warnings from Pam, preparations for Hurricane Katrina were shockingly poor," said Lieberman.

White House spokesman Scott McClellan said the administration is conducting a lessons learned review and "I'm not going to do a play-by-play analysis."

"And we've also been taking steps to make sure we prevent some of those problems that occurred from recurring in future response efforts," McClellan said. "And that's what we'll continue to do."

A month before Katrina hit, state and federal officials working on the Pam exercise estimated that government plans to evacuate people from New Orleans were only 10 percent complete.

"If you think soup lines in the Depression were long, wait till you see lines at collection points in New Orleans, Transportation Department regional emergency officer Don Day said at a July 29 briefing with federal and state authorities. Notes of the briefing, as recorded by Baton Rouge-based contractors Innovative Emergency Management Inc., were examined at the hearing.

"We're at less than 10 percent done with this ... planning when you consider the buses and the people," Day said at the briefing.

Lieberman also accused the White House of trying to stall a Senate investigation into the government's response to Katrina by failing to produce requested documents and prohibiting federal officials from answering questions. The inquiry is scheduled to be completed in March.

"This assertion of a kind of virtual immunity of the White House from this inquiry has obviously frustrated our committee's ability to learn and tell the full story of Katrina," Lieberman said. "In my opinion, it is unacceptable."

However, Lieberman noted, the committee did receive an e-mail sent to the White House Situation Room hours before Katrina hit, warning that the storm's surge could breach levees and leave New Orleans flooded for weeks or months.

Intramural wrestlers want Division I program

By Austin Meek
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

So you want to be a student athlete, huh?

Get ready to wake up at 5 a.m., run until you puke, sit through a lecture or two and then head to practice. After that, grab some dinner, cram for a test and collapse into bed, only to repeat it the next day.

For some, it means sacrificing playing video games all day, like a "normal college kid," but in exchange, receiving the glory and the full-ride scholarship — right?

Not necessarily.

For Ryan Parsons, a potential All-American with the K-State club wrestling team, there will be no ESPN SportsCenter appearances, no front-page headlines, no athletic scholarship.

For Parsons, it's all about the love of the sport.

"I've wrestled my whole life. It's all I know," Parsons, senior in mechanical engineering, said.

K-State doesn't have a Division I wrestling program, but wrestling coach Beau Tillman said his athletes work as hard as anyone on campus.

"We bleed and sweat just like (scholarship athletes)," Tillman said. "These kids — they do it because they love wrestling."

Tillman, who is in his third year as K-State coach, said bringing Division I wrestling to K-State is his main priority.

"I came to K-State to get that in motion," Tillman, senior in kinesiology, said. "That's what we're here for."

Drew Welchert, president of the K-State wrestling club, said there's the potential for a successful Division I program in Manhattan.

"We'd like to bring to the attention of people that there is a great deal of good wrestling at the high school level (in Kansas)," Welchert, senior in construction science, said.

SPT | Ticket office hours expanded

The K-State Athletics Ticket Office will offer expanded operating hours on the weekend dates of home men's and women's basketball games for the remainder of the season.

The ticket office, located in Bramlage Coliseum, will be open from 9 a.m. through game time for the weekend home games. The new hours will take effect for the first time Feb. 4, when the Wildcat men's team plays host to Oklahoma State at 3 p.m., followed by the women's game against Nebraska at 7 p.m.

Robin Foshia, director of ticket operations, said beginning with Wednesday's women's game against Kansas, all pre-paid public tickets designated for will call will be placed at the auxiliary ticket trailer located near Cats Closet outside the northwest entrance of Bramlage. This will provide a central location for pickup of previously ordered tickets and separate those fans from others attempting to purchase tickets at the Bramlage ticket windows.

NBA | Artest, Stojakovic trade unclear

Ron Artest has been summoned to a Wednesday morning meeting by the Indiana Pacers, who want to hear from the player himself on whether he is standing in the way of a trade to the Sacramento Kings for Peja Stojakovic, ESPN.com learned Tuesday night.

Artest and his agent were expected to meet Wednesday morning in Indianapolis with team executives Larry Bird and Donnie Walsh with the hopes the trade can be revived.

The Pacers and Kings were close to a deal Tuesday, and Stojakovic stayed at the team hotel in Philadelphia when it appeared the trade would be finalized. But a source with inner knowledge of the day's events said a call from Artest's agent, Mark Stevens, to the Kings gave them second thoughts about pulling the trigger, and the deal was temporarily shelved.

NHL | Lemieux announces retirement

Penguins star and owner Mario Lemieux announced his retirement for the second time at a news conference Tuesday afternoon.

Lemieux, a Hall-of-Famer who won Stanley Cups and scoring titles and then battled through cancer and heart problems in a comeback, announced his decision at a news conference.

The 40-year-old Lemieux learned in early December he has atrial fibrillation, an irregular heartbeat that can cause his pulse to flutter wildly and must be controlled by medication.

Lemieux also is experiencing side effects with his medication, and he may undergo surgery to correct the problem.

OLY | USOC will not credential Nardiello

The U.S. Olympic Committee will not allow Tim Nardiello to coach the American skeleton team at next month's Torino Games, despite his reinstatement by the sport's national governing body after an arbitrator found no evidence to support claims he sexually harassed two team members.

The committee found that Nardiello had too many violations to act as coach during the Olympics.

Vaulting to records

Christopher Hanewinkel | COLLEGIAN

Having set a new meet record at the KSU-MU-KU Triangular in Lawrence, senior Breanna Eveland also has earned the respect of her athletic peers, thanks to a strong work ethic, Coach Cliff Rovelto said. The former high school volleyball player was named the Big 12 Female Athlete of the Week on Jan. 17.

Senior Wildcat sets national mark with jump at annual triangular

KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Thirteen feet, 11 1/4 inches. For the uneducated, it's the height of the largest sunflower ever grown in the state of Michigan.

By sheer coincidence, or perhaps fate, it's also the height that senior Breanna Eveland cleared in the pole vault at the KSU-MU-KU Triangular in Lawrence last weekend to set a new meet record and tie the K-State record in the Sunflower State.

But enough about sunflowers. How about the fact that Eveland's jump also tied her for the best in the nation so far this year?

"It's a good feeling," said the senior from Grand Rapids, Mich. "It's so crazy to me because I never thought I would be tied for number one. It's so early. I hope I go higher."

The two-time Big 12 Female Athlete of the Week got her start in pole vaulting as a bored high-schooler with nothing to do in the spring.

"I was a big volleyball player," she said. "My dad suggested to me that I try pole vaulting since I have a strong upper body, so I decided to do it, and it turned out to be something I could do well."

Eveland said her high school coach, Dave Emeott, was a significant influence on her as a pole vaulter.

"He really gave me a great start," she said. "He really taught me the beginning of everything I know about pole vaulting. He was just extremely passionate and gave me a great foundation."

Of course, she also was quick to thank her current coach, Cliff Rovelto, saying he has been a great inspiration.

"He's been extremely influential," she said. "It blows my mind every day how much he's taught me since I've been at college."

Rovelto, who has coached 37 All-Americans in his 18th year at K-State, is as quick to praise Eveland as she is to compliment him.

"What makes her special is that she's been consistent with the success she's had the last couple of years," Rovelto said.

"So often you see jumpers get a high jump and then they can't hit it again."

But what makes Eveland truly stand out, Rovelto said, is that everything she has accomplished has been through hard work.

"That sounds trite," he said, "but it is true. She isn't exceptionally fast or tall. She isn't blessed with phenomenal jumping ability. She has a tremendous work ethic. As a coach, that's a neat thing to see."

Eveland was named the Big 12 Female Athlete of the Week on Jan. 17.

She was an Indoor All-American in 2005 and has cleared 13 feet in her last 11-straight competitions, which she's won eight of. She's also a member of a senior class that has never lost the annual KSU-MU-KU Triangular meet against rivals Kansas and Missouri.

So what does a student-athlete tied with the best in her sport do while juggling practice and competitions with homework and tests?

"It's hard to find free time," she said. "But when I can, I just like to relax and hang out — just have a good time."

Pure talent justifies Bryant's selfishness on the basketball court

Kobe Bryant, you're selfish. First, you and Miami Heat's Shaquille O'Neal called a truce a week ago to the beef you once had. Not only did it take away the most anticipated game that occurs twice a year, but now what are the networks going to show on Christmas Day?

Nobody wants to watch the eventual National Basketball Association champions, the Detroit Pistons, in a rematch of the western foe they beat for the title this year.

Then, in the same game on Martin Luther King Jr. Day, you break up a potential fight between O'Neal and Lakers' 18-year-old rookie center Andrew Bynum, after he dunked on the aging center and disrespected him on the other end of the court with an elbow to the chest.

Just think of what could have happened.

O'Neal could have snapped and tried to maul the rookie like he did Brad Miller of, at the time, the Chicago Bulls, after he brought out the "Hack-a-Shaq" four years ago.

No, you were just being selfish, once again, because you wanted the image of you two hugging as the lead story, not O'Neal vs. Bynum.

Now, you go out and score 81 points Sunday night against the Toronto Raptors, the second most since Wilt Chamberlain's 100-point performance for the Philadelphia Warriors in 1962.

It pushed the Seattle Seahawks and Pittsburgh Steelers out of the limelight that a Superbowl invitation usually garners someone on championship Sunday.

Still, "fans" are calling Bryant selfish for scoring all but 41 of the Lakers points in their 122-104 win.

The first thing people ask is, "Well, how many assists did he have?" The answer to that is two — the same number of assists Chamberlain had in his epic game in Hershey, Pa.

"OK, well how many shots did he take to get those points?"

It took him 46 shots, and he finished shooting an unlike-Allen Iverson 61 percent from the floor and once again topping "Wilt the Stilt's" 57-percent shooting performance 44 years ago.

Of those points, 55 came in the second half with the Lakers trailing by 13 points midway through the third quarter. His second-half outburst was more than any other players' (not named Kobe Bryant) total points this season.

What does this all do for Bryant?

Since his team more than likely will slip into the playoffs and be bounced pretty quickly,

Choosing online music

We've come a long way since the piece of opaque black plastic known as the cassette tape. Most K-State students were born into the era of the cassette, but since then we have moved to CDs, burnable CDs and we've finally landed in a digital audio era. There are a handful of ways to get the music you want, in a digital format, but which one is right for you?

Digital music began popping up on the Internet in the late 1990s when the Internet was beginning its boom, and computers were becoming extremely common throughout households.

Free trade began with the help of Napster and a number of other programs. There were two ways they could properly slow down this free trade: sue the pants off people and establish online purchasing services for legal music downloads.

Now there are more than a dozen different online music downloading programs that can satisfy nearly every taste. What makes each service different from the other? Here is a breakdown of some of the popular services so you can find the one that best suits your needs.

ITUNES MUSIC STORE

Apple introduced its iTunes program to a world that was previously unfamiliar with purchasing music online. Just because Apple fronts this program and service, doesn't mean it is restricted to Apple computers. PC computers running Windows can also use this service.

It works by charging 99 cents per track or, on average, $9.99 per album download.

The iTunes Music Store has the most extensive song and album catalog out of all the online music services.

The songs come in the 128Kbps per second bit rate. This is a measurement that determines the rate at which bits of data are transmitted. Essentially, the higher the bit rate, the better the quality. 128Kbps per second is an above average rate and will provide good sound quality.

There are some downsides to this service. Unfortunately, the downloads come in a proprietary AAC format that works specifically with the iTunes program.

Also, songs can be burned to CDs, but the same "playlists" or albums may only be burned up to seven times.

Lastly, because of the use of Apple's special Digital Rights Management encodings, the songs will only easily transfer to iPods.

MSN MUSIC

MSN Music is another pay-per-download service, similar to the iTunes Music Store. They share a lot of similarities, including price, but MSN Music does have some distinct advantages over iTunes.

MSN Music file format is in WMA, which is a more common open format that does not require a specific program or digital audio player to play the files.

The playback is initially set to use Windows Media Player, but there are a variety of programs that can play WMA files.

There are a wide variety of digital audio players and MP3-CD players that also support WMA. Additionally, the music averages a 160Kbps per second bit rate; a better quality than iTunes but not really a noticeable difference.

There are some downsides. The search engine and interface are lacking in functionality, and the music selection is not as extensive as the iTunes Music Store.

Courtesy art

NAPSTER

Napster is a little different than the other two previously mentioned music stores because they offer a subscription plan. There is an option to pay a flat rate of $9.95 per month for unlimited streaming music. Streaming meaning you are playing it over the Internet, and it isn't able to be burned onto a digital audio player.

For those wanting music on a digital audio player, Napster also offers the Napster2Go service. This plan is $14.95 per month and allows unlimited transfers to digital audio players. Unfortunately it only supports three different digital audio players at this time: the 5GB Creative Zen Micro, Dell's 5GB Pocket DJ and the 5GB iRiver H10.

The Napster service does allow regular purchases of music similar to MSN Music and iTunes Music Store. The same rates that we have seen before, 99 cents per track and $9.95, on average, for an entire album. These tracks are the only Napster-offered tracks that can be burned to a CD.

The Napster music catalogue consists upwards of 1 million songs – still not as much as MSN Music or iTunes Music Store – but more than enough for people with mainstream tastes in music.

So which music service is best for you? It depends on a lot of factors. The main: Where do you plan on listening to your downloaded music and what taste of music best fits your fancy?

If you have an iPod, then iTunes Music Store is the only way to go. If you have a wide taste in music, then one of the subscription services would be a better way to go, such as Napster. Regardless, each download service has their pros and cons, but all of them prevent the RIAA from knocking on your door.

Cast members of 'Lost' find big pay rises

LOS ANGELES — The cast of ABC's "Lost" has even more to cheer about beyond the show's recent Golden Globe win for best drama series.

"Lost" producer Touchstone Television has offered all original members of the large ensemble cast a substantial salary bump in exchange for an additional year to the actors' current contracts. The studio's pre-emptive offer would see the actors earn almost $80,000 each an episode next season, the show's third, up from a range of about $20,000-$40,000 for most cast members this season.

However, in the spirit of the show where no character is safe from being killed off, the actors are said to have no guarantees about the length of their tenure on the show.

Columnist remembers most embarrassing moment

Ask the 5th year

MATT
PETERWORTH
Class of 2006

Why is it called "The Edge"? It's not very edgy.

I thought it was called "The Edge" because it used to be on the back page, the actual physical edge of the paper. But after some investigation, it turns out the editors only put "The Edge" on the back when they want photos or illustrations in color.

For a little history about the section, it used to be called "Arts & Entertainment."

How boring. The editors then changed the name to "Lifestyles," but after a little while they realized that was a brand of condom, so they made the last change over to "The Edge."

As for the content of this section, I try to make my column as entertaining and edgy as possible. I've gotten criticism through Fourm comments and even a couple of letters to the editor. Nothing is edgy unless it offends at least some people, right?

What is your most embarrassing moment at K-State?

Fortunately, while I was living in the residence halls, no one took my towel and clothes while I was in the shower. I saw it happen to some friends, so I always took a towel with me into the shower just in case.

However, my most embarrassing moment happened one day after class. To preface the incident, you need to know what happened during class.

As a little activity, the professor showed some diagrams from patent applications during the late 19th century, and we had to try to guess what they were. He put the first picture up and in the front row I quietly raised my hand.

"Yes, Matt?"

"I'm not sure what it is, but whatever it is, I'm sure it keeps women in their place," I said.

Now, before you ladies take your bras off in a burning rage to protest the Collegian for hiring such a sexist as myself, let me assure you that I only say sexist things to be funny.

First, it means nothing coming from nothing. Second, my comments are as harmless as any joke on any sitcom.

The conclusion to this story, and the most embarrassing thing that has happened to me, is what happened after class. The three women in the class literally tackled me to the ground in front of the K-State Student Union and threw me in the fountain. I was soaking wet and had to walk all the way back to my residence hall.

It was all in good fun, though. The next class, I brought my towel and wore my swimming trunks and goggles. Now I stop and think before I open my mouth in class.

Republican announces candidacy for governor

By Roxana Hegeman
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

WICHITA — Ken Canfield, author of several books and articles on fathering, jumped Tuesday into the race for the Republican gubernatorial nomination.

Canfield came back to the Wichita elementary school he attended as a child to make the announcement in the first stop in a statewide tour that will take him to nine cities over the next two days. The Wichita native lives in Overland Park.

"It is true I have not been involved directly in the political process ... The bottom line: I am not a politician," he told about 75 cheering supporters gathered in the Clark Elementary School gymnasium. "But what I bring to the mainstream is something new and fresh — that ingenuity, that drive, that pioneering spirit that I learned."

Canfield, 52, founded the Kansas City-based National Center for Fathering in 1990. The private, nonprofit group provides training and support for fathers to become mentors for their children. The program was praised by First Lady Laura Bush during her visit to Kansas City last October.

Canfield has written several books and articles on the subject, including "7 Secrets of Effective Fathers" and "The Heart of a Father." He was one of the founding members of former Vice President Al Gore's private-sector Father-to-Father initiative.

In a statement, he said, "The reason I'm running for public office is simple. Kansas families and businesses are seeking a governor who can provide the vision and leadership to guide our state to a more prosperous future."

While short on specifics, his first campaign stop touched on some of the issues framing his campaign — better schools and a better business climate to promote growth.

"If we are going to grow as a state, we are going to have to be pro-growth, pro-business," he told supporters.

Canfield said he wants to take Kansas schools from good to great.

"To do so, we must examine how we allocate resources to our schools to ensure that the maximum amount of resources are invested in our teachers, and encourage parental involvement in our children's education," he said in a letter posted on his Web site.

At the same time, he said, the state must develop a tax policy that encourages growth.

"The principle of simple and low tax rates is necessary for our economy to be strong and vibrant," he wrote.

Pressed for specifics on how he was going to balance his stated goals of better schools with low business taxes, Canfield replied that it is a complex, challenging issue. He said this early in the campaign he had not yet formed a position on whether the state was spending enough on education, or studied the budgets.

Canfield joins a growing field of Republicans hoping to unseat Democratic Gov. Kathleen Sebelius, who is expected to run again.

Sebelius entered this year with more than $1.75 million in campaign funds, and national analysts have not considered the race competitive, despite Kansas' GOP leanings.

The two other major Republican candidates are Sen. Jim Barnett, an Emporia physician, and former Kansas House Speaker Robin Jensen of Healy. Also on the ballot for the August GOP primary are Dennis Hawver, an Ozarkie attorney who was the 2002 Libertarian nominee, and Richard Rodewald, a retired automotive engineer from Lawrence who's been a perennial candidate for state and federal office.

Barnett welcomed Canfield to the race, praising him as someone who has done excellent work for families. The senator said he looked forward to hearing Canfield's proposals to lower taxes, promote economic development and improve education.

"Kansas primaries are all about hearing different ideas and selecting the best candidate," Barnett said.

Canfield earned his bachelor's degree in philosophy from Friends University in Wichita. He has a master's degree from the University of British Columbia-Regent College and a doctorate in education from K-State.

Airplane accident in California kills 4; cause of crash unknown

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

CARLSBAD, Calif. — A private jet overshot a runway and crashed in flames Tuesday, killing all four people aboard, authorities said.

The Cessna 560 came in for a landing at Southern California McClellan-Palomar Airport on a flight from Hailey, Idaho, but went about 150 yards beyond the runway, smashing through scaffolding and slamming into a commercial storage facility, said Bill Polick, spokesman for the San Diego County Department of Public Works.

It was not clear if the plane ever touched down on the runway, he said.

The cause of the crash was not immediately known. Polick said the weather was clear and sunny with only light wind.

Norman Boyd said he saw the plane as he drove near the airport on his way to work.

"Its landing gear was up and it was going down really fast," Boyd, who worked on aircraft in the Navy, said in a telephone interview. "It was heading toward the runway and the approaching speed was way beyond what it should be."

The National Transportation Safety Board sent investigators.

The victims were not immediately identified, but authorities said the plane was registered to Goship Air LLC of Ketchum, Idaho.

Idaho business records show it is owned by Ketchum City Councilman Steve Shafran and Kipp Nelson, an investment banker and a trustee of the U.S. Ski and Snowboard Team Foundation. Calls to their homes were not immediately answered.

The airport, 30 miles north of San Diego, serves private planes, business aircraft and commuter airlines.

Disney Co. acquires animation giant Pixar Studios in $7.4 billion deal

By Gary Gentile
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

LOS ANGELES — The Walt Disney Co. didn't give birth to animated characters with names such as Buzz, Woody and Nemo — so now it's adopted them for good.

In a corporate marriage that keeps Mickey Mouse and Mr. Incredible as siblings, Disney said Tuesday it was buying Pixar Animation Studios Inc. for $7.4 billion in stock.

"We have seven children together," said Pixar CEO Steve Jobs, referring to the films the companies have co-produced, from "Toy Story" in 1995 to "Cars," set for release in June. "Keeping the family together is also a really nice benefit of this relationship."

Though Disney and Pixar have cultures as different as Southern and Northern California, they already are so intertwined that splitting them would have been an ugly divorce. There were moments when it seemed that might happen — but not anymore.

The deal could restore Disney's clout in animation while vaulting Jobs into a powerful role as the media conglomerate's largest shareholder, with roughly a 7 percent stake. Jobs, who owns more than half of Emeryville-based Pixar's shares and heads Apple Computer Inc., also will join Disney's board.

Disney has co-financed and distributed Pixar's aniated films for the past 12 years, splitting the profits. That deal expires in June after Pixar delivers "Cars" and it had once appeared the companies would not renew it amid friction between Jobs and former Disney CEO Michael Eisner.

But the talks revived under new Disney CEO Robert Iger. Disney, the theme park owner that also owns the ABC and ESPN TV networks, and Pixar had talked for months about a new relationship.

Pixar Executive Vice President John Lasseter will become chief creative officer of the animation studios and principal creative adviser at Walt Disney Imagineering, which designs and builds the company's theme parks.

Christopher Hanewinkel | COLLEGIAN

After more than a decade in the making, KSU Gardens officials have finished drafting plans to expand the gardens to 19 acres. The cost is estimated to be $62 million, and renovations will be done in several phases.

GARDENS | Future plans entail lakes, fountains and amphitheater

a flashback look to the original garden," McElwain said.

The original garden was torn down in 1978 after the relocation of the conservatory.

Like the original garden, the Formal Gardens will have a reflecting pool, which past garden-goers should be fond of, McElwain said.

Along with the reflecting pool, the Formal Gardens will have limestone walls, gated entries, formal structures, water features and an ornate fountain as a centerpiece.

The design for the Formal Gardens also calls for purple and white plant material and an arbor structure that borders a formal lawn, which could be used for group gatherings, like weddings.

Other elements include parking lot expansion and a 20,000-square-foot building that will serve as the garden's educational center.

Phase three, the Campus Creek Garden, will be located across from Jardine Drive, adjacent to the Veterinary Medical Sciences Building.

The Campus Creek Garden not only will be a continuation of the gardens, but also will take the place of the wetlands currently occupying the site, McElwain said.

McElwain also said the wetlands surrounding the proposed site for the Campus Creek Garden will serve as a water retention site for storm water run off which, in the past, has created problems for buildings and roads downstream.

To combat future flooding, the plans for the Campus Creek Garden include a lake with tiered waterfalls that will serve to safeguard the surrounding land against storm water and to filter the storm water of pollutants.

Impurities, such as fossil fuels and other chemicals the storm water may collect as it flows from the 238 acres to the north on its way to the lake, will be broken down by native plants and microbes in a natural way, McElwain said.

Besides a lake with tiered waterfalls, the Campus Creek Garden also will include shallow stone water crossings, a signature lake fountain, an amphitheater along the waters edge, a prairie garden, woodland garden, wetland garden, poisonous plant garden with a greenhouse and a Prairie Commons with restrooms.

"The garden is a good idea because it will bring more interest in the horticultural department and will give the community more as far as outdoor recreation goes," Sarah Breuer, sophomore in animal science, said.

The plans are finished, but because the gardens depend solely on donations and sponsorship there are no set construction dates and expansion starts and stops with the availability of money.

"As long as there is no wildlife misplace for recreational purposes, they should go ahead with the garden, it would be good," Josh Long, junior in fine arts, said.

Touching up the Conservatory, which was created in the early 1900s, is the No. 1 project, and after that comes the beginning of construction on the Formal Garden.

"We're not looking to make money off this project where a visitor might be excluded," McElwain said.

Since the gardens are free to the public, events like the annual iris sale, which takes place the last Saturday of July, take place in an effort to raise funds.

The next big fundraising event for the gardens will be a garden party in June.

"Though the party will be formal it won't be as formal as last summer's black-tie garden party," McElwain said.

The gardens remain free to the public with hours of operation running from dawn to midnight, March through November.

During phase two construction, K-State's current gardens will remain open unless otherwise announced.

Military personnel, graduates discharged

By Lolita C. Baldor
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON, D.C. — Hundreds of officers and health care professionals have been discharged in the past 10 years under the Pentagon's policy on gays, a loss that involves troops who are expensive for the military to educate and train.

The 350 or so affected are a tiny fraction of the 1.4 million members of the uniformed services and about 3.5 percent of the more than 10,000 people discharged under the "Don't Ask, Don't Tell" policy since its inception in 1994.

But many were military school graduates or service members who went to medical school at the taxpayers' expense — troops not as easily replaced by a nation at war that is struggling to fill its enlistment quotas.

"You don't just go out on the street tomorrow and pluck someone from the general population who has an Air Force education, someone trained as a physician, someone who bleeds Air Force blue, who is willing to serve, and that you can put in Iraq tomorrow," said Beth Schissel, who graduated from the Air Force Academy in 1989.

WRESTLING | Title IX, funds affect status of wrestling club

"These guys have no place to go in Kansas. We lose them to Nebraska, Oklahoma State, Iowa State.

"We want to get people talking about a Division I team at K-State, and maybe we could give those guys a chance to compete here at home."

Tillman said he hopes to bring a Division I program to K-State within the next five years.

For that to happen, however, Tillman said he must resolve issues with funding and Title IX.

Title IX, which guarantees women equal rights in collegiate sports, would dictate that K-State also add a Division I women's sport, Tillman said.

For now, Tillman and Welchert are focused on making K-State the dominant team in the Southwest Conference.

"One of our biggest team goals is to win the conference championship and be the big power in the conference," Welchert said.

"We've done that with a lot of success the last several years."

K-State is one of 19 teams in the Southwest Conference, which also includes Kansas, Colorado, Texas

Upcoming Schedule

Jan. 28 Great Plains Open (Lincoln, Neb.)
Feb. 4 Colorado Invitational (Boulder, Colo.)
Feb. 11 Kansas, Northwest Missouri State Duals (Manhattan, Kan.)
Feb. 26 Southwest Conference Tournament (Fort Worth, Texas)
March 9-11 National Collegiate Wrestling Association National Championships (Allendale, Mich.)

Tech and Texas A&M. Last season, five K-State wrestlers finished first at the conference tournament, and the Wildcats walked away with a conference championship.

This year's conference tournament will be Feb. 26 at Texas Christian University in Fort Worth, Texas.

Then, it's on to the national tournament in Allendale, Mich., where the Wildcats placed 10th last season.

K-State returns several wrestlers from last year's squad, including Parsons, who finished 4-2 at nationals in 2005.

Welchert said he hopes the Wildcats can improve on their 10th-place finish this season.

"We have a chance to win (a national championship) in the very near future," Welchert said. "That's what we're building toward. It's a very, very realistic goal."

Democrats, beholden to their interest groups, did not."

"Democrats have repeatedly twisted and distorted Judge Alito's positions to the point where they are unrecognizable," spokesman Stephen Schmidt said.

Alito was picked last October by President Bush to replace retiring Justice Sandra Day O'Connor. She was the high court's first female member, and a key swing vote on contentious issues such as abortion, affirmative action and the death penalty during her career on the court.

Alito was the White House's second choice for that seat. White House counsel Harriet Miers withdrew from consideration last year after conservative criticism of her nomination.

Republicans and Democrats are preparing to use the partisan battle over judicial nominations as a campaign issue in the midterm election this year. Republicans say the Democratic filibuster of a lower-court judge helped them knock off former Democratic Senate leader Tom Daschle of South Dakota two years ago.

If Democrats want to make judges a campaign issue, "we welcome that debate on our side. We'll clean your clock," said Sen. Lindsey Graham, R-S.C.

Sen. Jon Kyl, R-Ariz., warned that Republicans would remember the party-line Alito vote in future Supreme Court nominations, considering several Republicans voted for Justices Stephen Breyer and Ruth Bader Ginsburg, who were nominated by President Clinton.

"It is simply unrealistic to think that one party would put itself at a disadvantage by eschewing political considerations while the other party almost unanimously applies such considerations," Kyl said. "So I say to my Democratic friends: Think carefully about what is being done today. Its impact will be felt well beyond this particular nominee."

Sen. Dianne Feinstein, D-Calif., said things are different from when the Senate considered Breyer and Ginsburg, who were confirmed 87-9 and 96-3 respectively.

"There was not the polarization within America that is there today, and not the defined move to take this court in a singular direction," Feinstein said.

Liberal groups are pushing hard to get as many Democrats as possible to vote against Alito on the Senate floor. Anti-Alito protesters holding "Oppose Alito, Save Roe" and "Stop Alito" signs lined up outside the U.S. Capitol, hoping to sway some votes.

"Judge Alito's record as a professional — both as a Justice Department official and as a judge — reflects something more than a neutral judicial philosophy," said Sen. Herb Kohl, D-Wis. He noted that Alito has refused to call the Roe v. Wade abortion rights decision "settled law."

Alito's record "suggests a judge who has strong views on a variety of issues, and uses the law to impose those views," Kohl said.

But Sen. Arlen Specter, R-Pa., the committee's chairman and an abortion rights moderate, said he voted for Alito after questioning him on abortion at the confirmation hearings.

"On the issue of a woman's right to choose," he said, "it is my judgment that he went as far as he could go. He emphasized the factor of stare decisis and precedents, and the reliance factor."

this cleans up his image that he tarnished two-years ago when allegations of rape were brought upon him.

He became the butt of jokes and lost his image as the golden boy of the league with his squeaky clean persona and bright smile.

Bryant was the villain — everything that was wrong with professional athletics. His jersey sales tumbled, and his endorsements began to evaporate.

An 81-point game can do quite a bit for the image.

On Tuesday, Google.com unveiled the entire video of the game online for $3.95.

Also, the NBA Store in Manhattan, N.Y., will begin selling a Los Angeles Lakers jersey with the No. 81 and "Kobe" on the back, and a Spalding commemorative basketball is in the works.

Bryant is about to hog all the attention again the next time he steps onto the floor on Friday at home against the Golden State Warriors.

Just another sign of how selfish Kobe Bean Bryant really is, but right now, he has the right to be as selfish as he wants to be.

K-State, an early challenger to make the NCAA Tournament, striving to reach new heights

By Nick Dunn
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The win against Kansas in Allen Fieldhouse. The blowout victory against a streaking Missouri team.

The first three-game conference winning streak for K-State in 10 years.

All of these accomplishments are far from the extent of what the Wildcats hope to achieve this season. There is still much work to be done, senior forward Dramane Diarra said.

"It's a great feeling (winning three straight)," Diarra said. "We want to keep it going — try to win five, six, seven, eight games if possible."

In a Big 12 Conference that is seeing more parity than it has in years, anything is possible.

K-State is in a tie for second place in the Big 12 with Missouri and Colorado, the Wildcats' next opponent. However, the Wildcats have not separated from the pack.

In fact, if you throw out undefeated Texas and winless Baylor, the remaining 10 teams all are within one game of one another.

Sophomore point guard Clint Stewart said he is confident in what his team can do, as long as the players remain united.

"If we play together, I think we have a shot at beating anyone," Stewart said. "It's not about talent, but playing as a team. There's no room for error in this league."

It looks as if the Big 12 probably will receive fewer bids in the NCAA tournament this year, considering only two teams from the conference — Texas and Oklahoma — are ranked in the Associated Press top-25 poll.

That means a strong finish will be necessary if K-State hopes to reach its ultimate goal of playing in the NCAA Tournament.

Junior forward Cartier Martin, who, at 19.1 points per game, ranks second in the conference in scoring, said he is poised to make sure the Wildcats finish well in the Big 12.

"Winning these three games really boosts our confidence," Martin said. "I'm trying to help my team finish in the upper echelon of the Big 12. We want to make it to the postseason and be primed to make a run at the Big 12 Championship."

In ESPN.com's latest edition of "Bracketology," NCAA tournament analyst Joe Lunardi placed K-State as a 12 seed in the tournament, one of the last four teams to make the cut as an at-large bid.

The Wildcats were the fourth and final team representing the Big 12, along with Texas, Oklahoma and Iowa State.

Martin said he knows it will take consistency to reach the postseason.

"We need to keep playing the way we've been playing these last few games," he said. "We have gotten together as a team and been helping each other out. We are just letting the game come to us instead of trying to force things."

Diarra, one of the players displaying more consistency in recent games, put it simply.

"We want to go to the tournament this year," he said. "We will do whatever it takes to get there."

Professional dreams

Wildcats' forward receiving extra attention from national sports media

By Mark Potter
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

It is many basketball players' ultimate dream, including K-State forward Cartier Martin's.

Young children proudly wear jerseys of their favorite players while pretending to play in the National Basketball Association on their driveways.

"The NBA has been a dream of mine and almost every other college basketball player," Martin said. "But right now, I don't think about that. I'm just trying to help my team win."

So far, Martin's junior campaign has been impressive — so impressive it has caught the eye of a number of NBA scouts.

Martin ranks second in the Big 12 Conference in scoring (19.1 points per game), sixth in rebounds (7.3 per game) and field goal percentage (.526) and first in free throw percentage (.844).

Assistant K-State Sports Information Director Tom Gilbert said scouts from the Memphis Grizzlies, Milwaukee Bucks and San Antonio Spurs already have ventured to Bramlage Coliseum this season, and two scouts from the Indiana Pacers are slated to arrive when K-State plays Texas Feb. 22.

Martin, a 6-foot-7, 220-pound player from Houston, grew up cheering for the Houston Rockets. But now he tries to pattern his game after former Kansas Jayhawk and current Boston Celtic, Paul Pierce.

"I know he was a Jayhawk, but I don't look at him as a Jayhawk now — I look at him as a Celtic," Martin said of Pierce. "I like the way he plays. He is a very smooth player who lets the game come to him."

NBA draft expert Chad Ford of ESPN.com ranked Martin 54th in his Top 100 draft prospects of 2006. Ford projected Martin will be drafted in the second round if he decides to enter the upcoming draft June 27.

Ford ranked Martin No. 7 among small forwards and projected him as the only small forward from the Big 12 in the Top 100. However, ESPN.com listed eight Big 12 players ahead of him, including three players from Kansas, and the No. 1 overall prospect, Texas forward LaMarcus Aldridge.

ESPN.com's scouting report of Martin is as follows:

Positives: He's long, athletic, rebounds and has proven he can shoot the three. Big-time scorer. Versatile enough to even swing to the two on occasion.

Negatives: Injuries have limited his impact through the first two years of his career.

Summary: Martin's off to a sizzling start for the Wildcats. Scouts were very high on him coming out of high school, but injuries have led him to under produce the past two seasons. This season, he seems to be putting it all together and looks like he could be a good prospect.

Listed as a forward, Martin has been one of K-State's most versatile players over the past three seasons.

"I'm willing to play whatever position I need to help my team win a game," Martin said. "If I'm playing center, I'm cool with that, or if I have to play point guard, I'll find a way to help my team win."

Martin said he has improved because he is completely healthy and he was able to work hard in the offseason. But an increase in confidence also has contributed to his development this season.

"Yeah, I would say I'm one of the best players (in the Big 12)," Martin said. "You're never supposed to go out there and second guess yourself that someone else is better than you, so when I go out there, I always think I'm the best player on the floor."

Can Martin's dream of playing in the NBA come true? K-State point guard Clint Stewart said he thinks so.

"He's really showed his all-around game this year," Stewart said of his teammate. "He'd do well as a rookie if he left early. I think he'll have a good career (in the NBA), but by no means do I hope he leaves."

For the time being, Martin's dream is on hold, at least until he graduates with a degree in social sciences.

"I'm thinking about my education right now," Martin said. "I come from a house where education is one of the most important things in life. I'm going to try to finish up my degree in four years, and after I accomplish that, I'm looking forward to moving on."

K-State's spark plug

Senior guard Schyler Thomas, a former walk-on, emerging as a leader for upstart Wildcats

By Angie Hanson
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

He wasn't supposed to come to K-State. He was barely supposed to be on the team. No one thought four years ago that senior guard Schyler Thomas would be the driving force behind this year's Wildcat squad.

"My job isn't necessarily a statistical thing," Thomas said. "It's more just being a leader and going in there and bringing good energy, and calming the team down at the same time. Pretty much do anything and everything that I can when I'm in there."

Instead of K-State recruiting Thomas, the Omaha, Neb., native turned the tables and called on the Wildcats in 2002. He originally was supposed to go to the Air Force Academy on a basketball scholarship, but when it learned of his asthma diagnosis, it withdrew the offer. Thomas started doing some research and discovered K-State was lacking in the guard department, so he contacted Coach Jim Wooldridge and sent him some tape. After reviewing the tape, Wooldridge delivered Thomas a proposition.

"I talked with Coach (Wooldridge), and he said, 'If you work hard, you can play,'" Thomas said. "If you prove that you can (play), I'll give you a scholarship in two years."

Thomas was up to the challenge, and, much to his surprise, he wasn't forced to wait two years to step on the court. As a freshman, he saw playing time in 26 games, including 15 Big 12 Conference games — a feat he wasn't expecting.

"I was just expecting to come in and be a practice player, so that was a good feeling," Thomas said. "Thinking you're going to get nothing and then getting points as a walk-on is huge, especially as a freshman."

Sophomore year didn't bode as well for Thomas, with action in only 14 games. Though it was frustrating, he said he refused to get discouraged and once junior year rolled around, Wooldridge fulfilled his offer and gave the guard a scholarship. Thomas didn't disappoint, either, shooting a team-best 51.9 percent from the field on 22 starts.

Now the Wildcats are off to their best start under Wooldridge in his six-year coaching stint. Thomas has been an important part of that success, and people have taken notice of his powerful efforts off the bench. The now-infamous Kansas upset — which arguably was his best game of the season and his career — revealed a player who has the ability to do "anything and everything." He put his words to life with five points, including 2-for-2 on field goals and 1-for-1 behind the three-point arc, two assists and no fouls in 12 minutes in the victory at Allen Fieldhouse.

"There's nothing that he can really compare to it (Kansas game)," Thomas said. "It's definitely the biggest game of my career."

The Kansas win was a turning point for K-State. It was that victory that played a factor in igniting the Cats to play at the level they know they're capable of, Thomas said.

"The guys are playing with more energy now. They're playing harder," he said. "I knew, everyone knew we could, but they're just really buying into it now. It's a good feeling in the locker room, the coaching staff, the whole program."

In the game against Texas A&M on Jan. 18 in Bramlage Coliseum, another thing happened to Thomas that had never happened before — the home-court crowd of about 8,000 started chanting his name.

"I appreciate it. It meant a lot to me," Thomas said. "Not a lot of people have that chance. I think Darren Sproles, Terrance Newman and, of course, Bill Snyder, in my time I've been here, those are the only names I've heard chanted at a basketball game. So, to hear my name chanted, that was huge."

"It means a lot that the fans would rally behind me and support me like that and rally behind us, and hopefully they'll continue to do that all year."

Sophomore guard Clint Stewart said Thomas is a proud player, and the team responds to his guidance.

"Sky's one of our good leaders," Stewart said. "He doesn't want to go out and be embarrassed in front of a home crowd. He's a senior."

Even though it's winding down, there is still plenty of time and plenty of games left in Thomas' career for him to continue leading this team. Right now, he's trying to take each game in stride, with the NCAA Tournament always weighing in the back of his and his teammates' minds.

That would be the ideal way to end the season, but if it falls short, he just wants his guys to keep playing with the same team focus and confidence, he said.

"Our goal is to make it to the tournament. As a basketball player, personally, I grew up watching March Madness, so to make it to the tourney would be huge for me and the school," Thomas said. "I also just want to see the team continue to play like they've been playing — that's all I could ask for."

Thomas said he realizes the NBA is not in his future, but he is hoping sports will be involved in his profession. He has one more year left of school and is a dual major in finance and business. He plans to find a way to blend the three entities.

"I would love to stay close to sports but not be in them," Thomas said. "Working for a professional team, or if I could be a basketball analyst, that would be a dream job. You have to be famous or know somebody, though, so we'll see. I still have a year left of school, so I need to do some research."

Even though he won't be suiting up in the NBA, one of the game's finest point guards, Steven Nash of the Phoenix Suns, is Thomas' favorite player. Nash's intensity and the way he puts his team's intentions before his, are aspects of the NBA star's game Schyler strives to adhere to, he said.

"The way he plays is the way I would love to play," Thomas said. "He plays 100 percent — he plays hard and does so much for his team. To play like him would be incredible, and to play against him would be fun, too."

It's too early to reflect on his college career, but Thomas said it's shocking how fast it's gone. The scarier thing is how fast the next two months will go. The main difference between four years ago, when the freshman came to Manhattan with no clue what to anticipate, is he is grown up. He now has a firm grasp of what is expected of him, and he has earned the respect he deserves.

"I didn't even know what to expect coming down here," Thomas said. "I wanted to improve myself and prove to people that I deserve to play at this level, and that I should be here."

When fans, students, faculty and residents start cheering "Schyler," it's obvious they think he should be here, as well.

"I'm loving every minute of it," Thomas said.

Healthy Diarra proves his value during senior season

By Mark Potter
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Dramane Diarra had a difficult time last year.

The 6-foot-8, 245-pound senior forward knew if he wasn't injured, he could be on the court, contributing to his team's success.

This was the hard-to-swallow reality for Diarra in his junior season.

"I really think he could have helped us get to the post-season had he been healthy," junior forward Cartier Martin said of Diarra.

Diarra, from Paris, France, suffered a stress fracture on his lower left ankle in September 2004.

Initially slated to return within six to eight weeks, he re-injured the ankle in practice, which forced him to get surgery.

"I was going up for a layup or a dunk, and my bone just snapped," Diarra said. "A lot of people don't know it, but I think I was rushing to try to come back too early."

Diarra, who has started all but one game this season, said he might have lost an inch or two off his vertical jump as a result of the injury.

"I'm not really confident with my jumping ability off my left foot," Diarra said. "I try not to take off with one foot yet."

Though the seasoned 25-year-old insists he is not a huge leaper anymore, he has proven he can still block shots.

In fact, Diarra is No. 1 in Big 12 Conference play, with nine blocks total and an average 1.80 per game.

"(Shot blocking) is not about your vertical," he said. "It's all about timing."

While recovering this past summer, Diarra began honing his outside jump shot — the shot he used to help K-State upset Kansas Jan. 14 at Allen Fieldhouse.

"During the summer, I couldn't really move around, so I started working on my jumper and my footwork," he said.

Before Diarra's surgery, his mom came to visit him in March — it was the last time he saw one of his family members.

While in France, Diarra had aspirations of playing Division 1 basketball in the United States. He had a couple friends who had played in the junior college Jayhawk Conference, so he decided to send videotapes of himself to Cloud County Community College in Concordia, Kan.

Diarra

"I just took a shot at (Cloud), and it worked out pretty well," Diarra said.

In his sophomore season at Cloud, Diarra made a name for himself, averaging 15.7 points, seven rebounds and 1.6 blocks per game.

Diarra started receiving recruiting letters from Division I programs like Colorado, St. Louis, Iowa State, Nebraska and K-State.

Diarra chose K-State. "When I came to visit, I had a good feel for everything," Diarra said. "K-State is a good school in a good conference, and I saw nothing wrong with coming here."

In his first season as a Wildcat, Diarra played 16 games and averaged 9.1 minutes, 1.2 points and 1.2 rebounds.

After using a medical red-shirt last season, Diarra averages four points, 4.6 rebounds and 1.7 blocks in 23.2 minutes this season.

Along with the improved numbers came a better understanding of Diarra's individual role in helping the Wildcats win games, Coach Jim Wooldridge said.

"Dramane Diarra is playing as well as anyone on our team in terms of what his role is," Wooldridge said. "He is a capable offensive player at times within his role."

Next on Diarra's agenda:

1. Help his team reach the NCAA Tournament and 2. Graduate in May with a social sciences degree.

"I am going to try and do whatever it takes to help my team win," Diarra said. "If we keep on playing together like we did these last few games, we will be hard to stop."

Introducing K-State's fresh faces...

Marlies Gipson
FORWARD

Gipson was expected to be a dominant force down low and bring a physical presence to the court. She has this season by leading the team with 6.2 rebounds per game, 38 total blocks and averaging a fifth-highest 8.4 points per game. With Wheeler's injury, her role as increased.

JoAnn Hamlin CENTER

Hamlin has stepped up big in Wheeler's absence. She is pacing the Wildcats in field-goal percentage, with 57.1 percent on 60-of-105 shooting. The center also is the highest-scoring post, averaging 10.1 ppg. Her output is coming out of an average 19.1 minutes per game.

Shalee Lehning GUARD

Lehning has established she is capable of doing nearly everything. On the court, she leads the Cats with 81 total assists, is second in steals with 28 and field goal percentage with 55.1 percent on 38-of-69 shooting. Despite her size, she also is third in rebounds, averaging 5.9 per game.

Danielle Zanotti
FORWARD

Zanotti has yet to put up big numbers for the Wildcats, but that comes as no surprise, as coach Deb Patterson predicted the forward would be busy doing behind-the-scenes work. Don't count Zanotti out, though. There's still plenty of time for her versatility to shine through.

Coming of age

Freshmen becoming consistent contributors

By Matt Gorney
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

With the departure of five seniors from the 2004 women's squad, it was no surprise that the 2005 season would feature young talent.

What has been a surprise is how well freshmen Marlies Gipson, JoAnn Hamlin, Shalee Lehning and Danielle Zanotti adapted to K-State and Big 12 Conference play.

Entering the home game against intrastate rival Kansas tonight, K-State boasts a 13-4, 3-3 Big 12, record.

On the season, the Wildcats are tallying plus-12 points in the scoring margin against their opponents. They also average about three more rebounds per game.

Combined, the four Wildcat freshmen have 435 of the team's total 1,208 points (36 percent), recorded 137-of-285 total assists (48 percent) and grabbed 323-of-662 rebounds (48.8 percent).

"I think with this freshman class, we bring a lot of versatility," Lehning said. "We have Danielle Zanotti outside, she's got a great shot that she hits and knocks down a lot."

"When we have that with the versatility that we bring as freshmen, I think it's great for us because we're only going to get better with experience, and we're only going to grow up."

Lehning said she credits the team's upperclassmen with helping the freshmen make the transition to the collegiate level.

"We've come in and it's a much more intense and aggressive atmosphere, and it's just a lot different than what we were playing in high school," she said.

"I think that we've done the best that we can. We've come out each day and worked as hard as we can, to the best of our ability to not only help ourselves, but our teammates and create a great atmosphere for us to play in each day."

Lehning is second only to Marlies Gipson in rebounds this season with 100 and leads the team with 81 assists.

With 10 regular season games remaining and the Big 12 Championship still on the horizon, she is only 95 assists from breaking the all-time K-State season-assist record of 175.

In the Wildcats' first-ever victory against Louisiana Tech on Dec. 6, Lehning tied a single-game school record by grabbing 20 rebounds.

It was her first career start, in which she also scored nine points and had eight assists.

She was awarded Big 12 Rookie of the Week for her efforts.

When conference play began, the freshmen were given a taste of victory with a 53-51 home win over Texas Tech.

However, their first road game at Missouri proved to be a bitter learning experience, as the Cats lost, 68-42.

"I think the fire has always been there, but it's just a matter of, we're a young team, and as freshmen, there's no excuses for us, and we need to come out and compete every game," Lehning said.

"It's just been a learning process for us. We've had to learn to come with focus and intensity throughout a whole game, and there's not time for any mental lapses. That's something that we've had to learn, and we've done a pretty good job doing that."

JoAnn Hamlin said she thought strides were made by the freshmen between the Missouri loss and the 71-70 near-win in overtime against Texas on Sunday.

"I think we've actually come to the court with more intensity," Hamlin said. "In the Missouri game, things kind of went wrong, and we hung our heads a little bit and let it get away from us."

"That's a big thing — you score on one end, you want a stop on the other end."

In the Texas game, Hamlin was one of two Wildcats to score in double figures, posting 18 points, second only to junior Claire Coggins' career-high and game-high 26 points.

"After that Texas game, Coach (Deb Patterson) expects a lot out of us," Hamlin said.

"We showed a lot of improvement on a lot of things. We executed our offense well, and for the rest of the season, I think we're just going to have to build off that."

"They're staying tough, they're getting better, they don't let disappointment hold them back — they just keep coming at it."

Deb Patterson
COACH

She also said Patterson asked the freshmen to step up and assume a greater role on the team, and the team has done a good job of making that happen this far into the season.

"We all try hard every night on the court," Hamlin said. "Whether it be practice or a game, we're giving it all we've got."

Patterson said she was pleased with how the freshmen exhibited mental and physical toughness and a "commitment to execution" in the game against the Longhorns.

She also said the four are growing each day.

"I think they were in as tough an environment as you could put them in this early in the season," Patterson said.

"We were playing a lot of very tough road games against the most successful teams in our league and it doesn't phase them."

"They're staying tough, they're getting better, they don't let disappointment hold them back — they just keep coming at it."

Patterson, who is in her 10th year coaching the Wildcats, said the way the freshmen are approaching and playing in conference games has evolved as they gain more experience against other conference opponents.

"In their road opener, they didn't know how to fight, they didn't know what it was going to take. Then, they go to A&M, and they show signs of it, and then they go on their next road trip, and they begin to put the whole picture together," Patterson said.

"Hopefully, that's all stuff we can build on, but the essential element in Big 12 play is finding a way to bring that night-in and night-out."

Coggins trying to help young team by leading

By Cedrique Flemming
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Kendra Wecker, Megan Mahoney and Laurie Koehn have all graduated from K-State and the women's basketball program.

These women were the leaders and faces of K-State women's basketball during their time here, and with their departure, a new face has risen to the top to lead this team into the 2005-06 season.

Junior guard/forward Claire Coggins entered this season knowing she would be the player expected to take over the leadership role left by the former K-State standouts, and during the first few games, she did not adjust to her newfound expectations, Coggins said.

"I think I didn't play well at the beginning of the year because I was a little rusty," she said. "Also, it was hard coming into the season with everybody telling you that you were the leader. I had to work hard to get through it and not give up on my game."

The team started the season on a five-game winning streak, but Coggins was not playing like the leader of the team.

She averaged 11.6 points per game, 2.8 rebounds per game, .6 steals per game and was shooting 35 percent from three-point land.

Lately, Coggins has improved her play, especially in the last three games, and Coach Deb Patterson said she is starting to see the full potential of her star player.

Patterson also said she knows Coggins must step her game up for the rest of the season if this team plans on making a run for the Big 12 Conference title.

"I'm really pleased with the last three games out of Claire Coggins," Patterson said. "I think she has begun to show a level of consistency that she is capable of and that our basketball team needs for us to be successful down the stretch."

Coggins has better numbers in the last three games, averaging 19 ppg, 3.3 rpg, 2.3 spg and 43.5 percent from behind the three-point line.

She scored a career-high 26 points and connected on a career-best six 3-pointers before fouling out in overtime, as the Wildcats fell to Texas on Sunday, 71-70.

Performances like that, along with the level of experience Coggins brings to the table, are why her teammates look to her as the leader of the team.

Freshman guard Shalee Lehning has started in all six conference games this season and said she attributes part of her success to Coggins' leadership.

"Her experience is a great learning opportunity for us, and we know that we can count on her," Lehning said.

Coggins said she knows she must continue stepping up this season because she no longer can rely on the older players to take control of games. She must become that player and is looking forward to the challenge for the rest of the season, she said.

"It's different, in a way, because I can't look to my right and left and know that those are the girls that are going to win the game for us — now it's a bigger responsibility on myself and everyone individually," Coggins said. "It's just as fun this season because we are playing just as hard, and everyone gets to do a whole lot more."

Lehning said she knows how talented Coggins is, and she knows who to pass the ball to when they need someone to hit a clutch shot at the end of a game.

"Claire is an amazing player — she has the total package," Lehning said. "We know that we can count on her and she has the confidence to knock down the big shots, so we are going to continue to look to get her the ball."

Wildcats, Jayhawks meet for 90th time

By Matthew Girard
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

K-State and Kansas square off for the 90th time tonight in Bramlage Coliseum, but for the Wildcats, the Sunflower Showdown is just another Big 12 Conference game.

"KU is a rival to us, but it's another game that we are approaching the same way that we approach any other game," freshman Shalee Lehning said. "We aren't going to get wrapped up in who we are playing."

Despite the K-State players downplaying the rivalry, Coach Deb Patterson said the showdown between the schools is important, not just for the conference standings, but for women's basketball.

"I just think any time you have a rivalry between in-state schools, it's great," Patterson said. "It's great for your state, it's great for your fans, it's great for all the people that love your sport because it puts a little edge and kick to it."

The rivalry has lacked intensity the past few years, but this year, the Jayhawks are coming off their best start in school history, rattling off 12 consecutive wins before dropping three of their last four games.

The Wildcats (13-4, 3-3) and Jayhawks (13-3, 2-3) are separated by one game in the conference standings, but K-State has dominated the rivalry as of late, winning its last eight meetings against Kansas.

"To us, none of that kind of history matters," Patterson said. "For us, it's, 'What's happening today?' Who are our matchups, what's their personnel, what do they bring to the floor, how are they playing on the offensive and defensive end?"

The majority of K-State's questions regarding the Jayhawks center around senior forward Crystal Kemp.

Kemp is third in the Big 12 in scoring (19.9 points per game), seventh in defensive rebounding (8.5 rebounds per game) and is shooting 54.6 percent from the floor. The Topeka native has also tallied six double-doubles this season.

"Kemp is a great player," junior Claire Coggins said. "The help-side defense is going to be huge. We have to box her out and not let her get the put-backs that help her have those huge averages."

Along with Kemp, the Wildcats will keep an eye on seniors Erica Hallman and Kaylee Brown. Hallman is first in the conference in three-point field goals made per game (2.79) and Brown is close behind with 2.31 three-point field goals made per game. Both are averaging more than 13 points per game.

Lehning said the K-State's guard play will be just as important as post play tonight.

"We have to work on the inside/outside game against KU," Lehning said. "Brown is an amazing shooter from the outside, so we are all going to have to pay attention to detail."

K-State comes into the game still reeling from a 71-70 overtime loss to Texas on Sunday, but Patterson said the loss was a good experience for her team.

"It was a big leap forward, in respect to our intensity," Patterson said.

By Wendy Haun
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Shana Wheeler is forced to sit on the bench for the rest of the season due to an injury. That hasn't stopped her from being part of the team, though.

"We call her our 'lucky charm,'" senior center Jessica McFarland said. "When she wasn't there against Missouri and (Texas) A&M, we got killed. She's always positive towards us."

Wheeler was injured Dec. 19 in the game against Creighton. Suddenly, the sophomore — who had recorded a .378 percentage from the field and 35 total rebounds on nine games — was no longer able to play.

"Because she could jump like no other and she's one of the best boarders we have on the team, we really had to open up on that aspect," McFarland said. "She's so long and athletic that she could also get a lot of spots on the defense."

Through season-ending knee injury, Wheeler still positive force for K-State

"And she also had the experience in the Big 12 when she started last year with Kendra (Wecker), Laurie (Koehn) and Megan (Mahoney)."

Coach Deb Patterson said Wheeler's injury has not slowed her down.

"Shana's working as hard as you could ask anyone to work," she said. "She's extremely positive and making great progress, her range of motion in her knee is terrific and she's growing her strength right now."

"It seems like every time I'm walking to the gym, she's standing there, doing standstill shots. She's doing everything you could expect or ask your players to do as they come back from injuries."

Patterson said she agreed with McFarland — Wheeler has stayed extremely upbeat throughout her ordeal.

"She brings such a positive disposition and demeanor," she said. "You never see her duck her head or feel sorry for herself, and that's one of the things I really love and appreciate about Shana Wheeler is she's a competitor."

After Wheeler's injury, Patterson was suddenly faced with finding out how to fill the gaps in the offense and defense.

"I, quite frankly, am amazed that losing someone of her talent and her impact on the defensive end particularly, and as the rebounder, that we've been able to remain competitive," she said. "I'm really impressed with the overall team response to that. The challenge always is when you suffer an injury, you have to step up and find a way to make an impact."

Wheeler's absence has demanded a collaborative effort to fill the gaps in offense and defense, Patterson said.

"I don't know if we've done it with anyone individually," she said. "I think we've done it collectively and just kept our nose to the grindstone and said, 'Well, this is reality and we've got to make the best of it."

Junior Twiggy McIntyre said Wheeler is still helping the rest of her teammates out.

"I don't know how to describe how much she means to this team," she said. "It was a real blow to our program with her injury, but she's still there and she's still by our side, working."

Wheeler has had to go from physical presence on the court to a vocal leader, McIntyre said.

"She's just that voice in our ear on the court," she said. "I constantly hear her, she just is constantly giving motivation and is a positive feedback during this whole situation."

Her competitive spirit hasn't diminished in her time off the court because she knows what it takes to bounce back, Patterson said.

"She understands that you get hit and you just have to come back hard and that's what she's trying to do," she said.

Politician, author Canfield to speak

By Lacey D. Mackey
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Ken Canfield, Republican nominee for Kansas governor, will speak at 11 a.m. today in front of the Office of Student Activities and Services in the K-State Student Union.

Canfield
REPUBLICAN NOMINEE

Canfield, a nationally recognized author of books and articles about fathering, announced Tuesday he would run for governor, beginning a two-day statewide tour of nine cities.

Ben Davis, junior in political science and pre-law, said as a leader in College Republicans, he will volunteer in Canfield's campaign.

"He's presenting who he is and what he's doing," Davis said. "It's a really positive, upbeat thing."

Davis said Canfield will likely speak for 10-15 minutes, introducing himself and his family.

"This is just an announcement tour he's doing," Davis said. "He's not getting into specifics."

Although Canfield will not detail future plans, Davis said Canfield wants to help cultivate the family unit in Kansas and focus on education. Canfield also seeks to look after the state's small businesses, Davis said.

"It's very hard for small businesses to thrive in this state," Davis said. "He's willing to focus in on those things."

Canfield founded the National Center for Fathering in 1990 with the vision that every child's life would be invested in by a father or father figure. With this background, Davis said Canfield's nomination presents voters with a different kind of political figure.

"One of the big things, he is not a politician," Davis said. "He knows what it's like to have a payroll. He's an all-around model guy."

Davis said he hopes students will attend Canfield's presentation to hear a local gubernatorial nominee.

"For students, I think they need to really pay attention and really get involved and become informed," Davis said. "State and local government, these affect you the most."

Clint Westgate, president of College Republicans, said he thinks seeing Canfield would pique local government interest.

"From what I understand, he's going to be a good candidate," Westgate, senior in political science, said.

Westgate said Canfield's stop in Manhattan and other cities will be crucial in his race for governor.

"If someone is going to be governor, I think it's going to be an important stop in his campaign," Westgate said.

Davis said those who attend Canfield's lecture should keep an open mind.

"Before you make an assumption, come and listen and hear the man out," Davis said.

Kansas Attorney General Phill Kline obtains abortion medical records to investigate child rape and illegal late-term abortions, he told audience members in a Wednesday night lecture in Forum Hall.

There are as many as 4,000 registered offenders in Kansas who have a criminal record of exploiting children. Since beginning his term, Kline said he has investigated or referred out to investigation, prosecuted or referred out to prosecution more than 700 cases of adults sexually exploiting children.

As attorney general, Kline said he does not have the right to obtain medical records unless he has met the threshold of the Fourth Amendment. There must be probable cause to believe a crime has been committed in order to obtain a subpoena for medical records, he said.

"Every medical provider complies with requests, for every one shows those records so we can protect the child," he said. "The only one who says it is an invasion of privacy are the abortion clinics."

"We ought to have a priority of prosecuting adults who rape children. We have K-State students take a moment to personally speak with Attorney General Phill Kline following his lecture Wednesday night.

the tools to figure out the truth."

Kline took feedback from the audience and wrote topics on a wipe-board at the start of his lecture, which was sponsored by KSU College Republicans and Union Program Council.

Kline was sworn in as Kansas' 41st attorney general in January 2005.

Students can choose insurance

By Abby Brownback
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

K-State does not require students to carry health insurance, but student health insurance plans are available both locally and through K-State.

MEGA Life Student Insurance is offered to undergraduate and graduate students through the university, Tyler Roark, student insurance representative, said.

Roark, junior in pre-psychology, said 87 undergraduate and graduate students who are not graduate research or teaching assistants have the medical-only insurance.

Students taking at least seven credit hours are eligible to purchase the insurance, which pays all Lafene Health Center expenses but has a $500 deductible at other hospitals and clinics, Roark said. It costs $318 per semester and $127 per summer.

After the deductible is paid, students are responsible for 20 percent of the medical bill, if treatment is administered by a preferred provider, or 40 percent if treatment is given by another provider, Roark said.

"It caters to people who can use Lafene Health Center," he said.

Gallaher Insurance Service, 6124 Anderson Ave., also offers health insurance for full-time students.

The coverage, available with three levels of deductibles, ranges from $650 to $1,071 annually, owner Lindy Gallaher said. It covers up to $1 million in medical expenses.

"The whole idea is to help students out with a cost-effective plan," Gallaher said.

Many students, however, are covered by their parents' insurance.

"Most students are on their parents' plan, usually through age 23 or 24," Gallaher said.

Gallaher said he now has fewer than 20 students carrying his student insurance plan.

Danielle Accurso, sophomore in animal science and industry, said she will be on her parents' insurance plan until she graduates.

Accurso said she appreciates being covered by her parents' insurance.

Warm weather causes concern about wheat

By Sheila Ellis
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

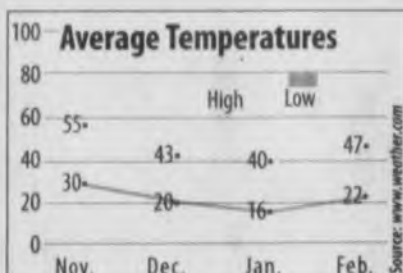

Manhattan has seen fairly mild winter weather this year, with record-high temperatures in the 60s and 70s.

The cause is the confinement of northern air by the normal jet stream, which sends cold air northward, Mary Knapp, state climatologist, said. This makes temperatures in states like Alaska, where the average high in January is negative 35 degrees, rise to the current average of 0 degrees.

Consequently, the weather in the Midwest is warmer.

K-State students might be enjoying the warmer weather, but Kansas agriculturalists might have a reason to be concerned.

"Usually, the temperature is a lot cooler than it is now, and for wheat crops that means that the crops are not accurately growing," Jim Shroyer, professor of agronomy, said.

According to the Kansas Wheat Commission Web site, nearly one-fifth of all wheat grown in the United States is grown in Kansas, which makes weather a main factor for Kansas farming.

In the winter, wheat is dormant, but warmer spring weather begins wheat growth.

This winter, however, the weather has not been cold enough to keep wheat crops dormant, which inlays the threat of damage, Shroyer said.

If the temperature drastically decreases from 55 degrees to 0 degrees, for example, the wheat would not be able to withstand the change, Shroyer said.

"The ideal climate for the wheat crops would be lower temperatures and higher percentages of moisture," Shroyer said.

The record high for January in Manhattan is 70 degrees, and the record low for December was negative 9 degrees, Knapp said.

"We got off to a very cold start, and we may have an equally cold end to winter," Knapp said.

Bo, a golden retriever, fetches a ball thrown by Erin Mader, sophomore in animal science and industry, as they play in City Park with the children she babysits Wednesday. The y decided to go to the park to enjoy the weather, which has been unusually warm this year.

Fetus photos fly over U. Florida campus

Genocide awareness project

GAINESVILLE, Fla. — In the same way shocking photos of the Holocaust and lynchings are used to change people's minds, a pro-life group hired two planes to carry banners of bloody, aborted fetuses over the University of Florida campus Tuesday.

Mike Schrimsher, Florida regional director for the Center for Bioethical Reform, said the photos were meant to elicit an emotional response and an informed debate about abortion.

"A picture's worth a thousand words, but it's still just one picture," he said.

The incident was not the first time UF students spotted these graphic images on the way to class, and it probably will not be the last.

Last semester, the center hired trucks and a plane to display photos around campus. This semester it hopes to bring its "genocide awareness project," which features photo murals comparing abortion to genocide like the Holocaust, to campus in an outside area such as Turlington Plaza, Schrimsher said.

He said he thinks shocking photos are effective tools for social change, comparing the abortion shots to photos of civil-rights protesters being attacked by dogs and hoses.

"It did elicit an emotional response when people saw those pictures, but it also forced a debate in this country that resulted in civil rights for African-Americans," he said.

Schrimsher said the center gets a lot of phone calls and e-mails from both supporters and opponents of its tactics.

The center hopes to bring the "genocide awareness project" to campus this semester, but needs to find a student group that will sponsor it first, he said.

Schrimsher said UF was a target because "all university campuses are important to us."

Tobacco grows into aid at U. Kentucky

LEXINGTON, Ky. — The College of Agriculture will now have nearly $800,000 to help match private gifts in support of undergraduate scholarships. The funding, which comes as part of the federal tobacco settlement, will match $1 for every $2 donated of any gift of at least $10,000.

"This is a great way of perhaps doing targeted recruitment," said Mike Mullen, associate dean of academic affairs for the College of Agriculture, about the potential for more scholarships. "With tuition increasing it's important for us to find ways to offset that cost for students."

Like many schools in tobacco-producing states, the University of Kentucky invested in tobacco research.

The university had large holdings of tobacco on its research farm that created income, Mullen said.

"We felt an appropriate use of our quota holdings was to turn it into scholarships benefit as many people as possible," Mullen said.

If the quasi-endowment scholarship program draws the private donations the college hopes for, it could potentially generate $2.4 million in scholarships.

That money would go into an account and only the interest, generating about $120,000 annually, would be used to fund scholarships.

The college currently offers students about $400,000 a year in scholarships. With scholarships ranging in $500 to more than $2,000, Mullen said the new funding could help as many as 40 to 60 more students.

News of the program has already generated interest from private donors, Mullen said.

So far, $558,000 has been pledged and the College of Agriculture has matched it with $279,000.

Dining centers consider health in menu options

By Yiyi Chen
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Holding a plate without a trace of greens, Miles Mentzer said he doesn't eat vegetables because there are few he likes.

"I mainly eat meat," he said. Mentzer, sophomore in agribusiness, said he thinks he has no control over his eating habits.

"Most of the time, I just go with what I want to eat," he said.

Dietary health is one of the most prominent issues to campus food controllers, said Mark Edwards, unit director for Derby Dining Service.

Edwards said the menu at the Derby Complex is written once every week, usually four to five weeks in advance.

"The menu is decided by a team of production managers," he said. "We don't use a cycle menu, which means our menu is fresh and creative all year long."

Edwards said his team also focuses on the balance of the food served at each meal. Apart from two entrees with some kind of meat to serve regular customers, an extra dish is added for both vegetarians and vegans.

"The meat will be like chicken, beef, etc.," he said. "We also emphasize on complex carbohydrates, items like potatoes, rice, pastas. Many times we use fresh vegetables instead of cans."

Edwards said the salad bar provides students with many vegetable toppings and leafy greens that are high in fiber and nutrients.

He said healthy diets can be accommodated by the foods offered in the cafeteria, and students should eat a variety of selections, not concentrate on one or two preferences.

"We know that in order to have the most nutritious meals, you need to choose from a variety of sources," Edwards said.

Edwards' assertion is backed by Tandalayo Kidd, assistant professor of human nutrition.

Kidd said a person's daily nutrition balance comes from a pyramid structure of food selections.

"Students should get food from all food groups, including a little fat to help the body absorb fat-soluble vitamins, which are A, D, E and K," she said.

Referencing the chart issued by the U.S. Department of Agriculture, Kidd said college students' normal daily caloric needs vary from 2,000 calories to 2,400 calories for females and 2,400 calories to 3,000 calories for males.

Kidd said students should be prudent about their daily food selections.

"Students should be careful to avoid eating disorders and balance calories with physical activity output," Kidd said. "Eat a balanced diet every day - different food groups provide different nutrients for the body."

The USDA provides sample menus for a 2,000-calorie food pattern, a level that the USDA uses to measure Americans' diets. It also provides a food balance worksheet for individual uses.

The information can be accessed at www.mypyramid.gov.

Harvard professor explains problem with Einstein's universe theory

By Christina Hansen
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Harvard University professor Robert Kirshner discussed the acceleration and expansion of the universe Wednesday evening as part of the Provost's Lecture Series on Excellence in Scholarships.

Kirshner's speech "The Accelerating Universe: Einstein's Blunder Undone" focused on Einstein's concept of a cosmological constant, which Einstein later considered to be a mistake.

The cosmological constant was used as part of an equation to calculate the size of the universe, or more precisely, Kirshner said, the size of the universe known to early 20th-century scientists.

Kirshner

"The Milky Way was the entire universe at the time," he said. "Astronomers believed that this system of stars was it, so Einstein was looking for a static, or unchanging, solution for its size."

Large telescopes later changed scientists' understanding of the universe. Kirshner said the famous Hubble Telescope proved that the universe consists of not one, but many galaxies, and that it is expanding at an accelerating rate.

"We infer that something like Einstein's cosmological constant is speeding (the expansion) up," he said. "We now call it dark energy."

Kirshner said that while new studies on dark energy also apply to research on the size and age of the universe, the exact nature and composition of this energy is yet to be determined.

"The stars in the universe let us see this epic tug of war, but we can't yet explain it," he said.

Kirshner's presentation was at the K-State Alumni Center and was sponsored by the University Distinguished Professors, the Department of Physics and the Center for the Understanding of Origins.

Origins chairman Tim Bolton, professor of physics, said he was impressed by the accessibility of Kirshner's lecture.

"He's a superb speaker," Bolton said. "He explained a very complex topic so that everyone in the room could understand it."

Mercy expands in anticipation of local population growth

By Kaley Lyon
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

With the anticipation of 30,000 people moving into the Manhattan area as a result of the Fort Riley, Kan., expansion and other area projects, Mercy Regional Health Center, 1823 College Ave., is looking to expand its services.

"When the hospital consolidated 10 years ago we wanted to be a little bit more of a regional hospital," said Joe Philipp, chief medical officer at Mercy. "We can expand services we provide not only for our local people and K-State students, but for the people in the surrounding areas as well."

Within the next seven years, the hospital hopes to recruit up to 45 additional health care providers, five of eight of whom are considered "high priority" and might relocate to this area in the near future, Philipp said.

In an attempt to recruit doctors, a national-based advertisement campaign has been launched. Though Mercy already was recruiting, this campaign began last summer, and Mercy has been experimenting with different forms of media to determine which is most effective, Lydia Huber, Mercy physician recruiter, said.

The campaign includes recruiting college graduates from universities, training programs and medical schools throughout the country. Typically, recruitment efforts are focused on Kansas and the surrounding states, but certain specialty needs have led to national searches, Huber said.

"Historically, folks who come to town have some kind of connection - they're the ones that we don't have to convince that Manhattan is a great place," Huber said. "Otherwise, we have to battle the stereotype of a small Kansas town, but when those people get settled, they're usually surprised that the stereotype doesn't quite measure up."

While Mercy has been involved in efforts to recruit additional health-care providers, the new doctors will not necessarily be employed by the hospital. Most local health-care providers operate their own facility, and this will not change.

Women's Center, Campaign for Nonviolence plan Season of Nonviolence activities

By Kelsey Noel
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The Women's Center and Campaign for Nonviolence are working together to prepare for the fifth annual Season of Nonviolence.

The 2006 Season of Nonviolence begins Monday and ends April 4, 64 days later.

The dates for the Season of Nonviolence were chosen to honor Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr. and Mahatma Gandhi, two historic leaders who practiced nonviolence, said Susan Allen, director of the Women's Center.

Allen said the ideas for the season began with a realization that cleaning up the mess that violence makes is not effective enough.

"We had to learn how to get ahead of the violence," she said.

Allen said the K-State Campaign for Nonviolence was formed as a result of these ideas.

Nonviolence is not just a concept, she said, but it is the actions people take to prevent violence before a crisis occurs.

"Nonviolence is learning the techniques and strategies for how to intervene in situations that could become violent if you don't step in," she said.

Several students also are taking part in the Season of Nonviolence.

Megan Challenger, senior in political science, said she got involved in the Season of Nonviolence through a class.

"During my sophomore year, I took Intro to Nonviolence with Susan Allen, and was required to attend at least one event during the Season of Nonviolence," she said. "I ended up going to more events because I met people with the same thoughts as me, saw good movies and learned how you can be nonviolent toward the environment. I also learned how to be an ally to groups on campus."

This year, Challenger said she is in charge of scheduling several of the events for the season.

"I got various groups such as the Kansas Equality Coalition and Ordinary Women to sponsor movies," she said. "I also will be a moderator for the Privilege Forum."

Kristina Kramer, senior in sociology, said she has been involved for two years. Some of her responsibilities include promotion of the season and planning some of the activities.

Events during the Season of Nonviolence will take place both on campus and in the community.

One community event is the second-annual benefit concert at Auntie Mae's Parlor on Feb. 16.

"The concert will feature a local band, Barefoot Rebellion," Kramer said. "We also will have door prizes donated from local businesses as well as promotions for other events."

Also taking place during the Season of Nonviolence is a presentation about the Vipassana on March 6 at the Manhattan Public Library.

The Vipassana Meditation is a 10-day silent meditation used in prisons in India, Kramer said.

Challender said her favorite part of participating in the Season of Nonviolence activities is the hope it brings.

"Even through small actions, we really can make a difference in society," Challenger said. "It really makes me feel important and like I am part of a change."

TO THE POINT Rationalism key to abortion discussions

Kansas Attorney General Phill Kline said Wednesday night that while abortion is a controversial topic, there is not enough rational discussion on it anymore.

The U.S. Supreme Court ruled in 1973's Roe v. Wade that laws against abortion violate one's right to privacy, and laws restricting abortion were overturned.

Since the ruling on Roe v. Wade, most people have been forced to choose one of two diametrically opposed sides: pro-life or pro-choice.

The subject evokes passionate feelings from both sides, largely because the underlying values run so deep.

But regardless of one's stance on abortion, moderate discussions on the topic are rarely seen anymore. Recent history has shown us, in fact, it is one of the most divisive subjects in society. Harsh attacks from both sides of the issue have only served to widen the divide between those who are pro-life and those who are pro-choice.

Kline's advocacy of rational debate, then, could not have come at a better time. A civilized debate would allow for everyone's opinion to be heard without judgments.

When discussing abortion, people should be willing to set aside their stances in order to hear the opinions of others. By doing so, a moderate discussion of a difficult subject is achievable.

To the point is an editorial selected and debated by the editorial board and written after a majority opinion is formed. This is the Collegian's official opinion.

Playing by the rules Mature video games should not be restricted

In America, some products are made illegal to users of a certain age.

These products, like tobacco and alcohol, cause actual harm to the individual. These laws are in place to protect these individuals until they are old enough to make a choice to use or not use them.

Now, with any luck on their side, Sen. Hillary Clinton, D-N.Y., and Sen. Joe Lieberman, D-Conn., will extend this philosophy to include products that might cause mental harm. If passed, The Federal Entertainment Protection Act will regulate the sale of Mature-rated games.

Do they really have nothing better to do with their time? Seriously, of all the issues to take a stand on, Hillary chooses video games?

I mean, I love the way she ran the White House for those eight wonderful years, but she has to get this stick out of her ass.

In this bill it would be up to the FTC to check up on random stores annually, to make sure they were not selling mature video games to anyone younger than 17. And the Bureau of Consumer Protection, a part of the FTC, would have to start filing complaints from all those angry mothers.

In other words, in a country that already doesn't have enough money to educate its children or feed its poor, we would have to start paying to make sure no one younger than 17 can buy a Mature video game.

Whatever happened to parents being responsible for what their kids do?

If you honestly don't want your kid buying the new Grand Theft Auto, pay attention to what they're doing. If you don't want to check up on what they're buying, don't expect Uncle Sam to take over that duty.

Even if we had the money to waste on such a senseless act, this one is totally unnecessary. Video games do not cause violence.

Every study I've ever read condemning one of my favorite pastimes points to the fact that playing these games increases aggression in the subject being studied.

However, aggression isn't an automatic cause of violence.

Take football, for instance. Last Sunday, I watched the majestic Denver Broncos allow Jerome Bettis to go to the Superbowl — that's just how nice they really are. With a Steelers fan for a roommate, I soon found aggression levels rising.

Even with all the aggression of the AFC Championship and full week of smack-talk preceding it, there wasn't even a hint of violence in our house.

This idea is backed up by a study by Jonathan L. Freedman from the University of Toronto. In this study, Freedman points out that just because you've watched a war movie doesn't mean you will run to join a war. He also suggests that after a large meal you might think about food, but you're not hungry to eat again.

The worst part of this law is that even if passed, it most likely would never even go into effect so essentially it's a waste of time.

In Game Informer, Doug Lowenstein, longtime president of the Entertainment Software Association said it would immediately be challenged on constitutional grounds. This is because it would associate the ratings with criminal liability, and the government would be yielding its authority to the ESRB, a private entity.

I can only hope this blind spot in Hillary's judgement has been caused by presidential hopes.

Maybe she's just trying to snag some conservative votes in case she chooses to run. Personally, I think her time would be much better spent caring about things that really matter.

Ford cutbacks show slow loss of tradition

Ford Motor Co. is underwarter, flailing for a breath of air.

Following along with the other major motor companies, "Employee Pricing" was the temporary lifesaver that buoyed Ford stock to a 52-week high of $29.85, but that support has been shed. Ford stock closed Monday at $10.79, down more than $19 from just four months ago.

Traditionally, such large companies seldom experience the stock price fluctuation affecting the Blue Oval.

In light of these developments, Ford has chosen to downsize. By 2008, up to 30,000 jobs will be gone; Ford's production will be a quarter of what it is now. Sadly, something had to be cut loose to allow Ford's head to breach the surface again.

Another automaker has already gone this route.

General Motors Corporation announced in November that 30,000 jobs and 12 plants would be lost in the days to come. GM's stock downfall continues as loyal Bowtie enthusiasts regret paying employee prices for vehicles and sultan prices for gasoline. Until alternative fuel vehicles hit the market in mass production, manufacturers of vehicles powered by fossil fuels will keep slugging like spent heavyweights in the 12th round, leaning on each other as they slowly go down.

In a competitive marketplace, the most efficient producer always wins, as the economist says.

Ford is looking to become more efficient, cutting $6 billion in material costs and "streamlining" parts purchasing. The recipe for streamlining calls for a grain of salt and a slender glass of spirit.

I prefer a more candid account.

Ford's stock rose after the announcement that the company would build vehicles from $6 billion cheaper parts.

How does that sound?

Furthermore, the current production process' inefficiencies are so paramount that "streamlining" is a term that can be seriously applied.

I'll shed no tears when Ford's market share dwindles to a miniscule proportion. There's no use PowerStroking Henry's ego. What goes up must come down.

Hopefully, for Chevy fans, GM will DuraMax its efficiency so as not to be taken over by the Toyotas and Suzukis currently buzzing on our byways.

I like tradition, the way things were, the good old days — however you say it, I'm a fan. However, I realize my country does not share this opinion.

If you desire for a large entity to rise up and remain in power for eons, move. Go to Antarctica, or England — not much changes there.

Here in the land of the 10-minute millionaires and fair-weather fans, staying on top is not difficult: it is impossible.

The question facing nearly 300 million capitalists: why fight a losing battle?

Adversity breeds optimism in my heart, likely also in yours. Faith, hope and love — the greatest is love with second being neck and neck between faith and hope.

Schemers scheme, inventors invent and buyers buy. The next Ford or GM might even be the current Ford or GM, but 15 years from now, the young punk in his million-watt personal transportation implement will stare blankly when I tell my childhood stories of glasspacks, burnouts, and cackling pipes.

Consolation lies in knowing we had a part in something, were witness to a time that led to the current state of improvement.

Students select housing for fall

By Abby Brownback
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Although it is only January, students are already deciding where they will live in August.

Julie Powell, sophomore in pre-professional business administration, lives in University Crossing, but said she does not know where she will live next school year.

"It's a huge process of, where do you live? Who do you live with? Do you renew your lease?" Powell said.

She said University Crossing offers cash benefits to tenants who renew their leases soon.

Anna Flores, manager of University Crossing, said returning tenants began signing leases in November. She said students should start searching for the next school year's housing shortly after Christmas.

"All the renters in town have a problem with filling up too fast," Flores said. "You have a bigger pool of apartments (earlier). You'll more likely get your preference."

Rachel Labrie, manager at Chase Manhattan Apartments, said Chase Manhattan has started showing apartments earlier each year because of the increase in demand. This year the management began showing apartments Jan. 2 for August leases.

Labrie said all three- and four-bedroom apartments will be leased by spring break.

"There is a high demand with the military base," she said. "There is a huge shortage of housing with all these soldiers coming in."

Chase Manhattan tenants used to be 95 percent students, Labrie said, but now 80 percent are students and 20 percent are military.

Alisha Hall, freshman in open-option, said she is exploring other possible housing arrangements.

"My parents want to buy a house so that we can have it and live there for the next few years," she said. "We own it, so we don't have to go through a landlord. I don't have to mess with payments, and we know we can have it for the next several years."

The residence halls also are open to returning students, though incoming freshmen have been submitting housing contracts since November, said Bob Burgess, associate director for business operation for Housing and Dining Services.

Early Room Preferring for returning residents begins in February, Burgess said.

ERP allows, in three stages, the residents to reserve their room, a room in their hall or any residence hall room before incoming freshmen are assigned to rooms in the summer.

ERP reserves a room for returning residents, but they must submit a contract by May 12 in order to guarantee that room, Burgess said.

"It gives them the opportunity to take care of their arrangements as early as possible," he said. "It puts them first in line."

K-State Community Service Program thankful for help

Editor,

On behalf of the K-State Community Service Program and the Manhattan Martin Luther King Jr. Memorial Committee, I would like to thank all those who made this year's Martin Luther King Jr. Day of Service a success.

Approximately 200 volunteers from K-State and the Manhattan community joined together to complete projects at 10 area social service agencies. In downtown Manhattan, along Poyntz Avenue, Third Street and Fourth Street, holiday decorations were taken down and yellow ribbons were hung. At Tuttle Creek State Park, 13 park benches were painted and restored, trees were trimmed and the shoreline was cleaned. At the K-State Child Development Center, a pre-school room was given a new coat of paint, 30 bookcases were stained and varnished and a new infant room was created. This required tasks such as assembling 10 chairs, seven cribs, seven mobiles, one changing table and one play area.

On this day, the Manhattan community joined communities across the nation in honoring King by making this holiday "A day ON, not a day OFF." Thank you for your commitment to service and to diversity in the Manhattan community.

Behavior of coach, recruits inappropriate at game

Editor,

To the football players who attended the basketball game against MU last Saturday night and our newly elected coach:

I would like to think your motivation for attending the game Saturday was to demonstrate your support for your fellow K-State athletes; however, the tasteless manner in which you acted led me to speculate you were attending for no other reason than to ruffle your own feathers.

As an avid K-State fan, I attended the game Saturday to provide some much-needed encouragement for our basketball team. It was an eventful game, and our players were playing hard. As I am sure you would understand, they were enjoying the support of the fans. This was, until you made your grand entrance from the locker room and drew the attention of the fans from their game.

Is there a reason you did not show up on time and entered from the back of the stadium? Do you think it was a classy exit to get up while the players were on the court?

Coach, I have a question for you. Was it appropriate for you to walk around shaking hands and taking pictures during the game? I'll just let you know that this K-State fan was very disappointed.

TO THE EDITOR

Alumnus encourages students to embrace learning opportunities to understand world

Editor,

Regardless of your politics, you should be pleased that President Bush chose to speak at K-State. Such occasions present remarkable learning opportunities.

In college, President Richard Nixon spoke and I was there. As the president talked about his purple tie, "purple pride" and football, I remember several malcontents rudely shouting, "What about the war?"

This was, for me, one of those times in life where things can become really complicated. This was our president, symbolically representative of everything good and right, a man whose position is deserving of honor and respect, and he's talking about fluff. Silently, I too wondered, "Yeah, what about the war?"

Responding to the hecklers, the president described acts of terrorism being perpetrated by such troublemakers as those who dared to protest. With the war hardly acknowledged, the audience turned toward me with pointed fingers and hateful words.

To my right was one of the protesters, and through this overwhelming rage from the crowd, I remember her crying and softly lamenting, "They don't understand. Oh, God. They hate us." Over and over she said this as tears streamed down her face. And it occurred to me, she was right. We didn't understand.

There are passages from Nixon's speech that may have well come from Bush's. He talked about "respecting the word of law," of "terror having no place in a free society." But what I could not have known was that just the day before his visit, Nixon had ordered the CIA "to foster a coup in Chile," that would eventually topple that nation's democratically elected leader.

I worry about a president who sees his personal determinations as a distinct embodiment of the law.

You each now have your own stories to live. I hope and pray that you will do so with an open mind: with the desire to truly understand the world around you.

Bush needs nonpartisan debate to gauge public opinion about Iraq War, terrorism

Editor,

In Washington, D.C., on Jan. 10, President Bush addressed members of the Veterans of Foreign Wars. He said "honest critics" of the war in Iraq have a right to question how the war is being fought, hold their elected leaders to account and demand a debate that brings credit to our democracy – and not comfort to our enemy. Bush blasted those he called "partisan critics."

President Bush, how do you know critics of your war in Iraq are giving comfort to the enemy? The enemy is carrying out suicide bombing missions in Iraq almost every day just because we are there. Do you really believe no criticism of the way your administration mishandled the war from the outset would dishearten the enemy? Are you, Mr. President, an "honest, nonpartisan proponent" of the war?

You call for nonpartisan debate. Instead of going around the country giving a nationally televised partisan monologue on Iraq to friendly audiences, why don't you debate on national television with "honest" war critics?

Your Jan. 11 visit to Louisville, Ky., was sponsored primarily by corporate interests to whom you cater. The "forum" event was obviously staged, scripted and your answers to the softball questions from the audience revealed nothing we haven't already heard. Why don't you give pro-labor groups equal opportunity to ask you questions in a comparable setting?

You like "fair and balanced" reporting of the news. Wouldn't fair and balanced question and answer sessions, forums or debates be an ideal way to inform the public? You say Democrats who are critical of your war policies are playing partisan politics. Didn't you use going to war in Iraq as an issue which helped win an unprecedented number of Congressional seats for Republicans in the 2002 mid-term elections? You also used Iraq to win re-election in 2004. It is not honorable to use war for political gain.

Cats need win over Buffaloes Saturday

The K-State men's basketball team has played more than half of its regular-season games of the 2005-06 season, and I'm happy to report these guys are still playing meaningful games with only 11 games left.

CEDRIQUE FLEMMING

By "meaningful," I mean each game the Cats play is still exciting and the outcome is consequential. They also are smack-dab in the middle of the Big 12 Conference race — a three-way tie for second place with Missouri and Colorado — which isn't a typical situation for a K-State men's basketball squad.

The men have opened with a 12-4 record to start the season, which is impressive in its own right, but their 3-2 record in Big 12 Conference play — along with their current three-game winning streak — has people like me wondering how good this team really is.

The Missouri Tigers were the outright No. 2 team in the Big 12 before last Saturday's 79-64 loss to the Wildcats in Bramlage Coliseum.

The loss dropped Missouri and enabled Colorado and K-State to join Mizzou at the No. 2 spot.

The game was one of the most exciting K-State basketball games I have ever been to.

People are beginning to attend the basketball games in masses because the team is seeing such great success.

The next home game is against Oklahoma State on Feb. 4, and I'm sure that game will be even more packed than the Missouri game, but before then, the Wildcats have to play two games on the road.

They play Baylor on Feb. 1 in Waco, Texas, but the game I'm looking forward to is this Saturday, when the Wildcats travel to Boulder, Colo., to take on the Buffaloes.

This game has serious implications for both teams for the rest of the season.

If K-State wins, it will sit alone in second place in the Big 12 and most likely will receive votes in the Associated Press and the USA Today Top-25 Coaches' Polls.

On top of that, the team will continue stamping its ticket into the NCAA Tournament, which it definitely has a legitimate shot at making.

Colorado is no cakewalk, though — this will be a dog-fight to the end and a great game to watch.

Colorado has the best scoring offense in the Big 12, averaging 82.9 points per game. K-State is only averaging 70.2 points, good enough for only eighth in the conference.

The Buffaloes also have the fifth-best scorer in the Big 12 in Richard Roby, who is averaging 17.8 points per game. He is also second in the conference in 3-point percentage (.438) and third in steals per game (2.25).

The Wildcats' best player is Cartier Martin, who is second in the conference averaging 19.1 points a game. He leads the conference in free throw percentage (84.4) and is sixth in rebounds per game (7.3).

This game has everything any K-State fan could ask for — two teams vying for a spot near the top of the conference, playmakers on both sides of the ball and NCAA tournament bids on the line.

If the Wildcats take down the Buffaloes this weekend, K-State fans will be able to stop wondering how good this team can be and begin appreciating how great it really is.

Wildcats' 2nd-half run leads to victory

By Matthew Girard
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

A 17-point lead almost wasn't enough for K-State in its 69-63 win against Kansas on Wednesday at Bramlage Coliseum.

After leading 31-29 at the break, the Wildcats (14-4, 4-3) came out of the locker room on fire. Led by freshman Marlies Gipson and Shalee Lehning, K-State used a 24-8 run to stretch the two-point halftime advantage against the Jayhawks (13-4, 2-4) to 56-39 with fewer than eight minutes left in the game.

"I thought those two were just incredible tonight," Coach Deb Patterson said. "I thought Shalee Lehning and Marlies Gipson just took this team on their backs. When we made the run, they were in the center of every big play."

During the run, Lehning, who finished with 10 points and five assists, and Gipson, who had a career-high tying 16 points, combined for 11 points and an alley-oop that brought the crowd to its feet.

"We were focused, we had great aggressiveness and intensity and each possession, we had a purpose," Lehning said.

Gipson said she remembered a previous alley-oop attempt when Lehning threw the ball her way.

"Her alley-oop pass was awesome," Gipson said. "I was just thinking of the one I missed in the Texas game, so I really wanted to finish that one."

With the run, it appeared

Gipson's finesse key in win over KU

By Matt Gorney
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Freshman Marlies Gipson is listed at 6 feet tall, while one of her opponents in Wednesday's night game against Kansas was 6-foot-2-inch senior Crystal Kemp.

In basketball, two inches is a lot.

Entering the night, Kemp was ranked third in scoring in the Big 12 Conference with an average of 19.9 points per game.

However, Gipson had an advantage in the mismatch — greater speed — that gave her the ability to dribble to the basket quicker.

"I just felt Marlies was tremendous," Coach Deb Patterson said. "We challenged her very early to get more aggressive — and to get aggressive quick — because I felt like she was bringing a little bit of finesse to the floor because of the mismatch and the size disadvantage she was facing."

"I think we saw a lot out of her tonight, as an athlete, and she's obviously the most athletic person we have on the floor right now."

Patterson also said she thought K-State gave a little too much to the Kansas offense early in the game. That was when Gipson decided to respond.

"Marlies had enough of that and stepped on the floor and said, 'Well, I guess it's time to attack, because I'm taking a lot of heat over here on the bench. I might as well get over there on the floor and take it,'" Patterson said.

Gipson's aggressive play also became a problem when she fouled out with 5:03 remaining in the second half, in the middle of a Jayhawk rally.

"That was when the game was going kind of a little crazy. They were catching up," senior Jessica McFarland said.

K-State managed to hang on for a 69-63 win against its in-state rival. After the game, Gipson said she was not pleased with parts of her play against Kemp.

"She's a great player, a big presence inside," Gipson said. "She has a sweet left-handed shot. I didn't feel I did the best I could on her as far as helping, but we got a win."

Although Kemp scored 20 points and notched 12 rebounds, Gipson tied her season- and career-scoring record of 16 points.

Bluegrass band wins Wakarusa spot

By Mark Sibilla
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Loco Macheen and The DeWayn Brothers Bluegrass Band won the Manhattan Battlerusa, ensuring them a spot on the Wakarusa Music Festival roster. Among the competition were the bands Audio Spaghetti, Storytyme, 13th Step and The Mathematics.

Loco Macheen and The DeWayn Brothers are the same band of seven members: Eric Nelson on harmonica, guitar and vocals; Garrett Briggeman on guitar, barjo and vocals; Brian Peterson on keyboards, accordion and vocals; Jamie Ferland on vocals and guitar; Joshua Finley on guitar, mandolin and vocals; Peter Gaskamp on bass; and Nick Newhouse on drums and percussion.

Briggeman said Loco Macheen has been together for about five years.

"Each of us have different musical backgrounds and influences," Briggeman said. "We never limit ourselves to one style. We want everyone in the band to be fulfilled musically and play things that everyone likes and has been exposed to."

Briggeman said Loco Macheen tries to play what is fun and what will sound the best.

During summer 2002, Loco Macheen formed The DeWayn Brothers as a bluegrass band that allows the members an outlet for their interest in that style of music. The DeWayn Brothers gained such a strong following in the local music scene that the members decided to continue with both bands, Briggeman said.

"We have traditional, old-time instrumentation played in a non-traditional fashion," Briggeman said. "We wanted to put our own spin on bluegrass."

The DeWayn Brothers have played at the Wakarusa festival the past two years. Briggeman said that they entered Battlerusa for the chance to have Loco Macheen perform at the festival as well.

In addition to playing at this year's Wakarusa festival, Loco Macheen will release a CD later this year and The DeWayn Brothers have recently released a CD in 2005, Briggeman said.

For more information on Loco Macheen and The DeWayn Brothers, visit www.locomacheen.com and www.dewaynbros.com.

The bands competed at Auntie Mae's Parlor in Aggieville, one of the stops across the Midwest chosen to host Battlerusa, a battle of the bands that recruits local talent for the chance at a spot on the roster of the fourth annual Wakarusa Music Festival in Lawrence.

This is the first year for Battlerusa, which was started by the Loyal Family production company.

Battlerusa started Jan. 18 and will continue until Feb. 10. It is a traveling party that spans 18 cities, where a winning band from each city will be chosen to play at Wakarusa. Wakarusa is June 8-11.

Bands entered Battlerusa by submitting a press kit by Sonicbids, said Eric Noble, a member of Loyal Family and the creator of Battlerusa.

Sonicbids is a Web site that allows bands and promoters to send their press kits -- including music, photos and date calendars -- to other musicians, promoters and magazines using the Internet. According to www.sonicbids.com, this helps cut costs and increases the convenience of sending press kits because bands no longer have to pay for postage and handling of materials.

Battlerusa competition showcases different music styles

By Lauren Rohrer
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Battlerusa, a touring battle of the bands designed to select a winner from each of its 18 stops to play at Lawrence's Wakarusa Music Festival, swept through Manhattan with five competing bands.

Monday and Tuesday nights at Auntie Mae's Parlor, 614 N. 12th St., Eric Noble and his production company, Loyal Family, gave regional talent the opportunity to play at the Wakarusa Music Festival.

"We had the idea, back in July, to start Battlerusa, and we pitched it to Wakarusa and worked it out," Noble said.

"Then we started routing cities and asked bands to submit press kits, and by December we had finalized our lineup."

Noble's company, Loyal Family, choose 100 of the 300 bands that submitted applications.

The five chosen to play in Manhattan were Audio Spaghetti, Storytyme, 13th Step, The Mathematics and Loco Macheen and The DeWayn Brothers Bluegrass Band.

First to play Monday was Audio Spaghetti. Bassist Brendan Arnold named 311 as one of his band's musical influences and described it's sound as a "crazy mix of pop/funk/metal."

"That's kind of where the 'Spaghetti' comes from, like a crazy mix of music," Arnold said.

Arnold and his bandmates, Josh Fellers and Jake Tablar, said they have been playing together for about two years and are working on their upcoming album, "Take Control."

Second up was Storytyme.

Lead singer Pete Lewis said that he and brothers Phil and Tony have played together for five years.

They recently added a fiddle player, Charles Lieser, to the group.

"We picked up the fiddler in Madison, Wis., a couple of weeks ago, inspiring our soon-to-be hit, 'Wisco-Disco,'" Pete Lewis said.

The members said they enjoyed their first trip to Manhattan, particularly their open jam night at P.J.'s Bar last week.

"If Dave Matthews Band was on crack and Conan O'Brien was the lead singer, then that would accurately describe our music," Tony Lewis said.

Storytyme also said it is excited about the next stop on their tour, a compact disc release party for about 500 fans at the Fox Theatre in their hometown of Boulder, Colo.

Beginning the competition on Tuesday was local band 13th Step. Band member Nick Reiter described the sound of 13th Step as "very blues and classic rock sounding."

The members of 13th Step said they would like to see a Manhattan band have the opportunity to play at Wakarusa.

"Everything's on the line with Battlerusa, and we are in it to win it," band member Nate Smith said.

Band members Smith, Nick Reiter, Loren Reiter and Theron Welch said they have been together for six years and anticipate the release of a new album this spring.

Second on-stage Tuesday night was The Mathematics.

Seven, the bassist, said the band was looking forward to playing with it's new drummer, Andy Lewis.

"We're the strangest band playing in this contest, but we're sending the same message as the rest, just a different package," Seven said.

The band likes to call its music a kind of "punk/country/rock" with influences from the 1970s punk movement and Midwestern music.

Last on the bill was Loco Macheen and The DeWayn Brothers Bluegrass Band.

Garrett Briggeman, member of The DeWayn Brothers, said the band played at Wakarusa for the last two years.

Recently combined with Loco Macheen, the band said it is excited about the possibility of performing a third time.

"With seven members, it's hard to limit our style," Briggeman said.

"We want to be open to everyone's influences to create a unique sound."

The band member said they love playing in Manhattan because it is friendly to local music.

Briggeman describes his band's music as a mix of "eclectic rock" and "insurgent bluegrass."

Eric Noble and Loyal Family said they were very impressed with the talent at this Battlerusa.

"Wakarusa is getting bigger than ever and we hope to have up to six stages at a time to showcase all this great regional talent we are finding" Noble said.

"People should get tickets early this year because we are capping attendance at 15,000.

HOROSCOPES

Aries (March 21 - April 19)
Beware of rodents.

Taurus (April 20 - May 20)
The bad news is, you're competing for that new job with a Hindu goddess. The good news is if you think YOU have trouble figuring out what to do with your hands during an interview.

Gemini (May 21 - June 20)
You will discover a sure-fire method of fooling all the people, all the time. It will have something to do with cottage cheese.

Cancer (June 21 - July 22)
Try to avoid nibbling on things today. Despite recent developments, you don't actually know your friend that well yet.

Leo (July 23 - Aug. 22)
You will discover you have a certain flair for copywriting and will pick up a little extra spending money by doing window signs for stores, such as "Going Out Of Business. Waaaaah!"

Virgo (Aug. 23 - Sept. 22)
Today you will wear way too much cologne and make strange unconscious lip-smacking sounds. You've been watching Comedy Night on The Subliminal Channel again, haven't you?

Libra (Sept. 22 - Oct. 22)
Boisterous day today. Try not to be much more irritating than is absolutely necessary.

Scorpio (Oct. 23 - Nov. 21)
A swarm of rats will sneak up on you, and you will be suddenly engulfed in a squeaking, biting, torrent of rabid vermin. Oops! No, ha ha, looks like I forgot about the influence of Venus, didn't I? Sorry. Hmmm. Ok... actually, today you will have pizza.

Sagittarius (Nov. 22 - Dec. 21)
Nothing especially remarkable will happen today. You will get a strange urge to talk like Ziggy Marley, but it will pass.

Capricorn (Dec. 22 - Jan. 20)
Old Neil Diamond songs will circle endlessly in your mind today. I recommend screaming and pounding your head on the table.

Aquarius (Jan. 21 - Feb. 18)
You will invent a new sort of optical illusion today, involving six straight lines, an assortment of blobs, and a picture of an iguana. Everyone will gasp in amazement.

Pisces (Feb. 19 - March 20)
Try to put things in perspective today. Basically, that means that things appear closer together, the farther away they are. That means that your problems are either big or close together. Cool, huh?

Planning for future stresses seniors

By Kelsey Childress
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

For graduating seniors at K-State, the end is near. With about 10 weeks until graduation, this can be a nerve-racking, stressful time.

"For everyone graduating, I think you are somewhat nervous about the future," said Michael Burns, senior in agricultural economics and student body president. "For me, change is always a little scary, but also really exciting."

Many seniors already have started looking for jobs, either online or through contacts they have made at K-State.

"I look on www.monster.com;

I receive updates from my departmental listserv, plus I make some 'cold-call' contacts," said Hannah Albers, senior in hotel and restaurant management.

Overall, the data implies that the job market has improved for many jobs, said Kerri Day Keller, director of Career and Employment Services.

"However, many careers are always hard to break into," Keller said. "It has a lot of do with what a particular student has done to make [him or herself] marketable."

Keller also said many seniors should have started their job search in the fall during the job fair, when many potential employers interviewed and made job offers to graduating seniors.

Finding a job early makes things less stressful during the spring semester, she said.

After spending five years here, Burns said he has one piece of advice that he wished someone would have told him.

"Start making your plans early," he said.

"If you are planning to go to graduate school, take the GRE your junior year so you can continue to improve your score. If you would like a job, start aggressively searching for that job fairly early."

Many seniors are concerned about getting into graduate school.

"Get grad school applications done early," Jericho Hockett, senior in psychology, said. "I've applied to grad schools, so hopefully I'll get accepted somewhere and put in about five more years."

Hockett said the best part of her K-State experience has been the people she's met.

Other seniors said nights in Aggieville or K-State sporting events are their best memories.

"At K-State, I have had the opportunity to do a lot of really cool things," Burns said. "But overall, I enjoyed hanging out with friends the most. K-State football tailgates are always a blast. The members of the Kansas State family are the memories that I will carry with me for a lifetime."

Rumsfeld defends military readiness

By Lolita Baldor
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON D.C. - Secretary of Defense Donald Rumsfeld on Wednesday disputed reports suggesting the U.S. military is stretched thin and close to a snapping point from operations in Iraq and Afghanistan, asserting "the force is not broken."

"This armed force is enormously capable," Rumsfeld told reporters at a Pentagon briefing. "In addition, it's battle-hardened. It's not a peacetime force that has been in barracks or garrisons."

Rumsfeld spoke a day after The Associated Press reported that an unreleased study conducted for the Pentagon said the Army is being overextended, thanks to the two wars, and may not be able to retain and recruit enough troops to defeat the insurgency in Iraq.

Congressional Democrats released a report Wednesday that also concluded the U.S. military is under severe stress.

Reports suggesting the U.S. military is close to the breaking point "is just not consistent with the facts," he said.

In an apparent shot at the Democratic Clinton administration, Rumsfeld said a number of components of the armed forces were underfunded during the 1990s, "and there were hollow pieces to it. Today, that's just not the case."

He said there were more than 1.4 million active U.S. troops, and some 2 million - counting National Guard and Reserve units - of which only 138,000 people were in Iraq.

"Do we still need more re-balancing? You bet," Rumsfeld said.

The secretary suggested he was not familiar with reports suggesting an overburdened military. But, he said, "It's clear that those comments do not reflect the current situation. They are either out of date or just misdirected."

Former Secretary of State Madeleine Albright and former Secretary of Defense William Perry, both members of the Clinton administration, were credited among the authors of the study that Congressional Democrats released.

It said that U.S. ground forces are under "enormous strain," adding, "This strain, if not soon relieved, will have highly corrosive and potentially long-term effects on the force."

In the earlier report obtained by The Associated Press, Andrew Krepinevich, a retired Army officer who wrote it under Pentagon contract, concluded that the Army cannot sustain the pace of troop deployments to Iraq long enough to break the back of the insurgency.

As evidence, he pointed to the Army's 2005 recruiting slump - missing its recruiting goal for the first time since 1999 - and its decision to offer much bigger enlistment bonuses and other incentives.

Rumsfeld said "retention is up" and recruitment levels must meet higher goals, ones raised because of the operations on the ground.

At the same time, Rumsfeld added: "There is no question if a country is in a conflict and we are in the global war on terror, it requires our forces to do something other than what they do in peacetime."

"The force is not broken," Rumsfeld said, suggesting such an implication was "almost backward."

The world saw the United States military go halfway around the world in a matter of weeks, throw the al-Qaeda and Taliban out of Afghanistan, in a landlocked country thousands and thousands of miles away. They saw what the United States military did in Iraq.

"And the message from that is not that this armed force is broken, but that this armed force is enormously capable," Rumsfeld said.

The Army fell more than 6,600 recruits short of its goal of enlisting 80,000 troops last year, the first time it missed its annual target since 1999 and the largest shortfall in 26 years.

But the Army exceeded its monthly recruiting goal in December for the seventh consecutive month, though some of those targets were lowered from last year's. It will have to increase its recruiting pace, however, to meet its target of 80,000 that it has set for the budget year ending next Sept. 30.

A new law will let the Army attract older recruits, raising the top age from 35 to 42. In addition, financial bonuses for enlistments and re-enlistments have increased.

The Pentagon's next budget and a broad-based review of U.S. defense strategy should be seen as "the next step in a long line of bold changes" for the military, rather than a list of program adjustments, he said. Both the budget for fiscal 2007 and an update of the Pentagon's long-range plans are to be released early next month.

Special operations and intelligence are among the programs expected to see increased funding.

Senate gives first-round approval of Medicaid bills

By Carl Manning
POSITION THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

TOPEKA - Lawmakers want to deal with rising Medicaid costs this session, and the Senate moved in that direction Wednesday by giving first-round approval to a trio of bills designed to make it easier to address fraud, abuse and waste in the health care program.

A final vote by the chamber, scheduled for Thursday, is needed to send the bills to the House.

Senate leaders expected easy passage of the measures that were the center of the Legislature's first health policy debate this year.

Legislators have fretted about rising Medicaid costs and prospects for fraud and abuse.

While there are no firm figures on the amount of fraud, one estimate indicates at least $110 million a year in Medicaid payments are improperly paid

"If you want to save significant money, you are going to have to look at raising eligibility requirements and lowering benefits."

Dwayne Umbarger
SENATOR, R-THAYER

in Kansas.

The marquee bill creates an inspector general's position in the attorney general's office.

The inspector general's job would be to examine allegations of Medicaid waste and fraud and turn over findings to the attorney general's office.

Originally, the inspector general was to be appointed by the governor and be part of the Division of Health Policy and Finance. But the Senate wanted the inspector general appointed by the attorney general, subject to Senate confirmation, and work in that office.

The bill was amended in committee to expand the inspector general's investigative authority to state employee health insurance. But an amendment offered by Sen. David Wysong removed that on a 30-8 vote.

"There may be a time when we want to add this, but now isn't the time," Wysong, R-Mission Hills, said. "We need to crawl before we walk."

Sen. Jim Barone, D-Frontenac, who opposed the change, said, "I believe it's important as we look for dollars and efficiencies in state government, we look in every place."

Another bill allows the attorney general's office to file civil lawsuits to recover Medicaid money improperly paid.

Currently, only criminal charges can be filed.

Violators would be subject to civil penalties of up to $10,000 and could pay triple damages when fraud is proven.

The damages would be the state's loss of money.

The third bill creates the crime of obstruction of a Medicaid fraud investigation and would expand the state's assets forfeiture law to cover Medicaid fraud.

"It gets the specific authority on the books, that's the point of it," said Senate Majority Leader Derek Schmidt, R-Independence.

Senate Ways and Means Chairman Dwayne Umbarger said while the bills will help, lawmakers must look at other areas.

"If you want to save significant money, you are going to have to look at raising eligibility requirements and lowering benefits," said Umbarger, R-Thayer.

Attorney General Phill Kline talks with audience members as they ask him about his opinion on a variety of legal topics during Kline's lecture Wednesday night in Forum Hall.

KLINE | Attorney general encourages open dialogue

In August, he filed a lawsuit that sought to end state funding of abortions for Medicaid, saying the abortions violated the state Constitution.

After the lawsuit was dropped Tuesday, Kline said in a statement Wednesday he does not plan to appeal the recent ruling unless directed to do so by a subsequent resolution passed by either chamber of the legislature.

In February 2005, Kline launched an investigation of child rape by having a judge subpoena the medical records of nearly 90 women and girls who had late-term abortions at two abortion clinics in Wichita and Overland Park, Kan.

Kline said he is not seeking names of the women in the investigation, and they are not subject to any criminal liability.

Though he is pro-life, Kline said he would act to respect the right of a woman to have an abortion.

"I think privacy is one of the more fundamental issues that we will face as a society in the next 20 years."

Phill Kline
KANSAS ATTORNEY GENERAL

While abortion is a tough topic, it generates good, legitimate discussion in the United States, Kline said.

"There is far too much judgment in the discussion, and we cannot even discuss this thing anymore," he said. "In the middle is the rational discussion that you never hear."

On the issue of privacy, Kline said Kansas is the third state to prohibit genetic discrimination in the workplace.

Kline said he also has taken action to protect medical records so health-care providers cannot sell them to marketers.

"I think privacy is one of the more fundamental issues that we will face as a society in the next 20 years," he said.

Ben Davis, junior in pre-law and political science, said he thinks Kline cleared up misconceptions about his stance on issues, especially abortion.

"He's a really smart guy, and if he doesn't know about the issue, he'll tell you," Davis, a member of College Republicans, said.

Shannon Babcock, senior in social work, said she agreed with Kline that dialogue is closed on the issue of abortion but not on his policy of obtaining medical records.

"It is events like this one that are a step in the right direction in opening dialogue," said Babcock, who is the chair for the Manhattan chapter of the National Organization for Women. "I appreciated his dialogue on concerns with his policies."

WOMEN | Win comes in last seconds of game

the 90th Sunflower Showdown would be decided by 20 or more points for the seventh time in the last nine games, but the Jayhawks battled back after Gipson fouled out with more than five minutes to play.

After Gipson sat down, seniors Erica Hallman and Crystal Kemp led Kansas on a 15-4 run of its own, cutting the 17-point deficit to three points with 1:23 left in the game.

"It wasn't just the loss of Marlies," Patterson said.

"I thought we mixed our combinations a little bit, took some quick shots for about six or seven possessions and against a good basketball team, that's all it takes."

"You string together three or four quick shots and shots

	K-State 69	Kansas 63
	K-State	KU
Field goals	25-60	25-54

that don't go in and then multiply that with a make on the other end, you are going to find yourself in trouble. I thought we got careless once we started tinkering with combinations."

Kemp, the Big 12 Conference's third-leading scorer, finished with her seventh double-double on the season with 20 points and 12 rebounds; Hallman finished with 18 points.

Kansas would pull within two points with less than a minute to play, but junior Claire Coggins, who finished with 12 points and three assists, went 5-for-6 from the free-throw line in the final seconds to seal the win for the Wildcats.

Patterson said, despite the closest point total between the two schools in five years, she was proud of her team.

"I thought we fought really hard, saw flashes of quality basketball tonight and then down the stretch, when we had that four- or five-minute period where we got real sloppy. I thought we stood in and found a way to make free throws, took care of the basketball and held on for the win," Patterson said.

"I'm not going to say it was pretty, but for a young basketball team, I thought they did a great job of battling down the stretch, when KU had gained momentum."

Louisville, Texas highlight 2006 football schedule

Staff Reports
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

For K-State fans wanting more high-profile nonconference football games at Snyder Family Stadium, their wish has been granted.

K-State coach Ron Prince released the Wildcats' 2006 football schedule Tuesday, and highlighting the non-league part of the schedule are home dates with Marshall – the last game of a three-game series with the Thundering Herd – and a newly announced deal with Louisville, a member of the Big East Conference.

The Wildcats meet Marshall on Sept. 16, with Louisville visiting the following Saturday, Sept. 23, for the first meeting between the two schools.

The last time Marshall played in Manhattan, the Thundering Herd upset the No. 6 Wildcats 27-20. During the 2005 season, K-State traveled to Huntington, W.Va., and escaped with a 21-19 win.

The Cardinals, runner-up to Virginia Tech in the 2006 Gator Bowl, are coming off a 9-3, 2005 season and boast one of the top quarterbacks in the country in junior-to-be Brian Brohm.

In conference play, the Wildcats welcome the defending national champion, Texas, on Nov. 4 as part of an eight-game home schedule.

"I could not be more pleased with the competitive balance and structure of our 2006 schedule," Prince said in a release. "All along it has been our goal to construct a schedule that first and foremost allows us to compete for the Big 12 North Division title while at the same time providing us an opportunity to showcase our program on a national level. I believe we have been successful in achieving both goals with this schedule."

K-State's season kicks off Sept. 2, when the Wildcats play host to Illinois State. A home date with Florida Atlantic follows on Sept. 9, before K-State closes out the nonconference slate with Marshall and Louisville.

For the ninth time in the 11-year existence of the Big 12, K-State will make its league debut on the road when the Wildcats travel to Baylor for their 2006 conference opener Sept. 30.

Oklahoma State returns to Manhattan for the first time since 2002 on Oct. 7, followed by a stretch of four-straight Big 12 North Division games beginning with Nebraska at home on Oct. 14.

A home date with Iowa State on Oct. 28 is sandwiched between road tilts at Missouri on Oct. 21 and Colorado on Nov. 4, before the Wildcats welcome the Longhorns to Snyder Family Stadium on Nov. 11.

To close the season, K-State will tussle with rival Kansas in the 104th Sunflower Showdown scheduled for Nov. 18 in Lawrence.

Student season tickets will remain

UGB covers spring issues

KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The Union Governing Board met Thursday to discuss recent developments and coming attractions to the K-State Student Union.

Kerri Keller, director of Career and Employment Services, said that this year there have been a high number of employers seeking students and that she believed the next two years will be strong, as well. In addition, Keller said February is one of the best times to interview for a job.

The 50th anniversary of the Union will be celebrated in March. Celebrations will begin March 1, and the final event will be March 11. Activities will include a Harry Potter extravaganza and a visit from David Eisenhower, grandson of the late U.S. president Dwight D. Eisenhower and nephew of Milton Eisenhower, former president of K-State. David Eisenhower also is a professor of history at the University of Pennsylvania.

In other business:

■ The ceiling above the Subway dining area in the Union is now covered with tile. Also, the Union is trying to develop a full Starbucks store in Union Station.

■ The UGB voted to donate $1,000 to the funds that support commission of the new bust of the Rev. Dr. Martin Luther King Jr., which was dedicated earlier in the week.

■ Craig Johnson, assistant director of the Union, proposed an idea for a 32 inch flatscreen TV to be placed in the south entryway of the Union. This screen will be able to display the activities being offered in the Union.

■ Students may now pay with cash or use their cards to pay for food in the Union Food Court regardless of what line they are in.

Thrifty finds

Local thrift stores open up world of treasures at cheaper prices

By Lacey D. Mackey
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Janie Wilkinson was introduced to thrift store shopping by her brother.

Although she still frequents shops in the mall to buy clothes, Wilkinson, junior in biology, said she loves a good thrift store find.

When she was in high school, Wilkinson said most students wore brand-name clothing, but she preferred T-shirts and jeans.

"It was kind of, you wear certain things, but I just wore whatever," she said.

After coming to K-State, Wilkinson said she continued to go to thrift stores for inexpensive items.

"When you go to college, you start running out of money pretty fast," she said.

Goodwill and Salvation Army are two of Wilkinson's favorite shops, but she said she never underestimates the quality she can find in someone's closet.

"Back home, I probably go to my dad's closet," Wilkinson said. "He has those really cool snap-button shirts."

The most Wilkinson said she has spent at a thrift store was $20 for a bowling shirt and a stone-washed jacket with sheepskin interior.

One of her favorite thrift store items, Wilkinson said, is a vintage Aerosmith shirt her brother found.

"I wear it religiously," Wilkinson said. "I've been offered $50 for it before."

While she loves to shop for clothes at thrift stores, Wilkinson said the territory seems to be more acceptable for males.

"I see more guys than girls," Wilkinson said. "Guys are cheap." Wilkinson said clothes are not the only thing one can find at the local thrift store.

"You don't just have to limit yourself to clothes," she said. "You can find buttons, even old cellphones, like the Zach Morris-type one."

Because of her love for thrift stores, Wilkinson and friend Jen Porter, junior in kinesiology, started a group on Facebook.com called "I'm addicted to thrift store shopping!" after shopping at thrift stores in Kansas City, Mo.

"We started it because we went to Kansas City and found five polyester suits for $5 each," Wilkinson said. "I wore the jacket out for a party once."

Porter said her favorite thrift store find is a baby blue polyester suit she found with Wilkinson.

Student Senate discusses possible health privilege fee increase

By Adrienne DeWeese
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Student Senate introduced the legislations of an increase in the student health privilege fee and the establishment of the student health reserve account at Thursday night's meeting.

Both bills will be discussed at the Privilege Fee Chair Committee meeting Monday, and Student Senate will take final action on both bills at next Thursday's meeting.

Privilege Fee Committee Chair Matt Wagner said he met with Lafene Health Center Director Lannie Zweimiller over the course of a month to discuss an adequate increase in student health fee costs.

Wagner said he and Zweimiller discussed the possibility of an office visit fee.

"We decided that for the welfare of the entire campus community, the user fee would not be appropriate," Wagner said. "Students may not use the facility if they have to pay a fee each time they are seen."

Wagner said the increase in student health privilege fee for fiscal year 2007 would be $565,758 across the student body. For students taking 12 or more credit hours, health costs would be $102.07 for the first year, but costs would drop to $88.42 for the second year. Costs for the third fiscal year would increase to $91.77.

The increased fee in the first fiscal year would aid in making up for past deficits due to rising health care costs, Wagner said.

"We have not seen an increase in student health in the past four fiscal years," Wagner said. "With the increase in health care cost, this is a necessary procedure."

Student Body President Michael Burns said there is a lack of available doctors in the Manhattan community, and the situation will worsen with an influx of soldiers coming back to Fort Riley.

"It is extremely important that we have health services here on our campus available exclusively to our students at a free cost, enabling them to get the medical attention they need," Burns said.

The Establishment of the Student Reserve Account bill also is up for final action. Wagner said the account would allow Lafene to move money in its operating expense accounts to a reserve account. The account would allow $200,000 for fiscal year 2007, and $60,000 for the following two fiscal years to prevent expenses from being greater than in the actual account, Wagner said.

"The account would allow for emergency situations at the end of a fiscal year," he said. "Lafene almost saw emergency situations at the end of last year and will probably see (such situations) at the end of this year."

Chinese New Year | Year of the Dog

Cultural showcase ushers in Chinese New Year

By Megan Molitor
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The Year of the Dog got its start in the K and S ballrooms of the K-State Student Union Thursday evening when the Department of Modern Languages sponsored a celebration for the Chinese New Year.

The event was planned and put together by students in Chinese classes, with the help of Wei Wu, Chinese language instructor. The Chinese program is new to the university, and Wu said they have enjoyed increased enrollment since its start.

"This is the first year for the Chinese language students to put this on for American students," Wu said. "The purpose is for students to learn about the Chinese culture and practice the language."

The celebration had traditional Chinese dances, performed by students, along with Japanese students dancing. There also was singing, karaoke, a magic show and a lesson on singing "Happy New Year" in Chinese.

The event was filled with traditional colors and foods, provided by Panda Express, who sponsored the event, along with Mary Kay and the Chinese Students and Scholars Application.

Panda Express provided fortune cookies and coupons for all attending, while Mary Kay had a drawing for products.

"Wei Wu did a wonderful job of putting this together," David Graff, associate professor of history, said. "This is the first year Chinese students have put this on for American students, and I think it has gone very well."

Many of those involved said they shared enthusiasm for the new event.

"I think this program is wonderful, and it's just starting out," Robert Corum, department head of Modern Languages, said. "It's really building enthusiasm and is good for everyone and increases the understanding of Chinese culture."

About 70 people arrived to take part in the activities and partake in the food, company and history of the Chinese New Year.

Everything went according to plan, and everyone got a chance to learn more of the history behind it all, Wu said.

"I like how the event turned out," Lan Guan, graduate student in grain science said. "I came to meet new people, make new friends and to learn more about new cultures."

Joslyn Brown | COLLEGIAN

Performing at the Chinese New Year Celebration, Shi Feng Ruan, graduate student in grain science; Min Gui, graduate student in electrical engineering; and Jiayi Li, eighth-grader at Eisenhower Middle School, do a traditional Chinese dance. The celebration marked the beginning of the year of the dog.

TO THE POINT Be charitable by donating to thrift stores

That "hideous" sweater your grandmother gave you for your birthday might actually be a valuable find for someone else in the community.

When you do your spring cleaning this semester, instead of throwing out the clothes or items you don't want, donate them to area thrift stores and let others get some mileage out of them.

Although college students might find your old threads to be just their style, your donations will serve a greater need in helping to clothe needy local residents. These are the people who truly need your help, and the more you give, the greater chance you're giving to those in need to clothe themselves and their family.

The Manhattan and K-State communities have always advocated recycling and reuse of products, and your donations will serve as your contribution to a cleaner, more productive environment.

Donations to certain thrift stores, such as the Goodwill and the Salvation Army, also are tax-deductible, as long as your donations are made by Dec. 31. So, although it might be too late to write off your donations for this tax season, you can always get a head start on next year.

So break out a garbage bag or two this spring, dig through your closet and make a trip to your local thrift store — that old pair of parachute pants still have a few good years left in them.

I've always hated change. I break out in hives at the thought of putting out a new roll of toilet paper.

Graduating high school was tough; going to college scared the hell out of me and getting out of my long-term relationship was near impossible.

I had been with this guy. Whom will we call "Guy," for about a year and a half. When I went to college, we were the type that thought we would defy the odds and last forever.

And for a while, things went fine.

Butterflies, rainbows and bunnies; the whole package. This elusive happiness carried on through first semester, but then things took a turn.

I began to notice problems in our little paradise.

For one, Guy wanted to drive the three and a half hours to see me every weekend. Irritating, but not nearly as irritating as the fact that all he wanted to do when he was here was profess our love to each other. My attention span for this was short, and I would longingly watch my friends prepare for evenings of boys, pizza and lack of sleep.

When I did venture out on my own, he would proceed to call every 15 minutes and act like the power of God was raining his ill-will on him when I wouldn't answer. Or worse, the times I wouldn't drop everything and have hour long conversations with him.

This wasn't working.

However, my change-a-phobia prohibited me from doing anything drastic for quite some time. So I put on a smile and played the love-stricken girlfriend long enough that it changed me and made me somebody whom I wasn't happy being.

Then something changed.

On a rare night without Guy, my roommates and I went out. I was in rare form, and chatted up anybody who stopped long enough to breathe. I realized how different things could be and that maybe it was possible to jump off a cliff to see where I land.

So I did just that.

I went home that night, and perhaps with a little extra courage, called Guy and explained to him that what we had just wasn't where I needed to be right now. It really sucked, and I never want to do that again, but what scared me the most was how, underneath all my shock, I felt relieved. I felt like somebody had unlocked some door I wasn't even aware existed. Nothing seemed impossible or difficult anymore.

But Guy kept calling me and called each of my friends with questions of what went wrong.

He even went as far as to drive up to Manhattan with a tire iron ready to annihilate anyone he thought had gotten between us. Instead of scaring me into submission, it forced me to take a hard look at my life and realize how much better of a place I was in post-relationship.

The new single and happy me can't help but ask myself why I stayed so long. I don't think I'm alone though. Too many people think if they just tough it out, it all will smooth over in the end.

In my case, I believe the opposite happened, and I had a chance to see what could have happened to me had I let this continue.

Once I got over my fear of trying something new, the single world that had been turning without me for so long, I realized how many opportunities awaited me.

Change can be a tough obstacle to get over, but nothing except for walking to the edge and diving right in will get you anywhere in life.

The end of the tunnel doesn't always lead to light. Sometimes it just leads to more tunnels, but I think that's OK as well.

The difference between offense and harm

I sat down to take a crap one day, completely unaware I was about to learn something while I was perched upon the porcelain pedestal.

At first, I was leery about introducing my topic in this fashion. However, I figured at least half of the world poops — one of my girl friends informed me that females do not actually go No. 2 — so it shouldn't be taboo.

I was in a friend's house, and I picked up the proximate reading material to make my entertain myself.

I looked through a book called "The Big Questions," and found a section entitled "If you're offended, are you harmed?"

I was intrigued.

I skimmed over it for a minute or two and became aware of an important discrepancy between the notions of "offense" and "harm."

I realized if I am offended, I am not necessarily harmed.

When I previously had been offended by something, I was the one inflicting the harm upon myself. I subconsciously allowed ignorant comments or actions devoid of truth damage my calm.

Uptight people sometimes bother me. But I'm starting to think I shouldn't feel like a jerk if I offend these people who have a habitual inclination to complain. It's not my fault they are overly sensitive.

Inevitably, these people will make rationalizations about how offensive material affects them. I'm not even sure if they believe some of their own excuses.

Sometimes, these easily-agitated victims might reluctantly admit that they are not actually being harmed, but that they speak out for people that it could potentially harm.

This is when the classic "slippery slope" argument seems to make an appearance.

I laugh at them internally. Externally, I nod my head as they preach their farcical worldview.

I imagine if there is a God, we are here for Her entertainment. I would like to think She is watching a comedy, and not a drama. I would hope Her laughter isn't procured from pity or irony either.

Summarily, I am writing this to humbly suggest making the decision to not take yourself, life, anything too seriously.

As a sign of good faith, I would like to show my commitment to all of you that I have made the individual decision to disassociate harm from offense. I will do this in the form of a personally offensive self-deprecating poem:

I'm not a gansta, I'm just a cracker
I don't think I could get any more wacker
See, I'm just a Ritz, looking for cheese
But I lack glitz and am the topic of tease
I can't dance; I'm too white and jumpy
When I try, I look like I'm doing the 'Humpty'
I've got no beef, because I'm just a chicken
If I got in a fight I'd get a good ass kickin'
Because the only thing I shoot, is prematurely
Girlie, just touch me and I go too early
I used to cry and shout when I felt debased
But now I just make fun of myself to my face

Schools discuss condom sales in residence halls

By Eileen Laux
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Northwestern University has proposed to have condoms sold in their residence hall vending machines.

Jessica Joslin, senior in history and social policy at Northwestern, is the co-chairwoman of the committee proposing the distribution. She said the committee knew the university was buying condoms, but they weren't distributing them.

"The resident assistants used to have them, but we got word that they weren't giving condoms out anymore," she said. "The committee decided to talk with the Director of Health Services and wanted to know where all the condoms were going."

Joslin said they had several ideas regarding a new distribution system, but several of them were problematic, such as putting them in bowls. The vending machines seemed like an idea, but it would have to be an ordinary machine.

"We didn't want specific condom vending machines," she said. "There can be problems, like shelf life and people might be embarrassed to go to that machine. This way maybe the person is just coming down for some Raisinettes or something, they aren't visibly recognized and won't have to go and ask."

She said another advantage to putting protection in regular machines is the packages will be checked with all the other things in the machine.

The program is being tested at two residence halls at the university, Bobb and Allison Hall. If it works, the committee might look into trying to get the university to subsidize the condoms.

Joslin, residence halls for-

"I'm sure some people would wish that students wouldn't have sex, but this is the world we live in and people need to have access to the means to protect themselves."

Katie Kuhlman

SENIOR IN BIOLOGY AND MEMBER OF SEXUAL HEALTH AWARENESS PEER EDUCATORS

mer co-director of the college feminist group, said this program is about making condoms available to students that need them. The condoms would be available 24 hours a day, and it has been estimated they would cost about $2.25 for a pack of three.

"The point is to make them easily accessible to students, and I think this is one of the best ways to distribute them," she said. "I think this is something that other schools could look into and see if it suits their needs. We have gotten positive feedback so far."

Derek Jackson, assistant director of housing for resident life, said K-State used to have condoms supplied in the residence halls through vending machines and over the front desk.

The vending company for K-State resident halls, Five Star Vending, decided to drop hygiene products in the late 90s.

Jackson said no one has asked for the residence halls to supply them again, but if someone did express enough interest it is something that could be pursued.

"I think there was not as much sexual education back then as there is now," he said. "School systems talk more about it and the potential risks are more well known."

He said students would have to express interest in the distribution through the residence halls or through the vending machine company.

Terry Francis, general manager for Five Star Vending, said condoms in the machines is something the company could do, but they would have to seriously think about it first.

"I think we would want to buy separate machines for that and maybe try it in more of a bathroom situation," he said.

Francis said no one has called requesting protection in the vending machines, but if he had a big request he would think about it.

Katie Kuhlman, senior in biology and a member of Sexual Health Awareness Peer Educators, said she thinks it is a modern idea. She said a realistic approach would have to be taken.

"I couldn't see how it could hurt the student body," she said. "The point of SHAPE and condoms is to get the point across."

She saw the vending machines as a rewarding idea to market safe sex because organizations like SHAPE can only do so much.

"I'm sure some people would wish that students wouldn't have sex, but this is the world we live in and people need to have access to the means to protect themselves," she said.

The Russian National Ballet will be in Manhattan tonight to perform "Swan Lake."

The full-length ballet is in four acts, with choreography by Marius Petipa and music by Pytor Ilyich Tchaikovsky. The performance is at 8 tonight in McCain Auditorium.

Thom Jackson, marketing and development officer for McCain, said the ballet is a touring show and K-State has had this in the lineup for about a year and a half.

"We are really excited about this," he said. "The show is taking off very quickly and we already have a very large audience. If you are waiting to get tickets, I suggest to get them immediately."

The upper balcony is the only location left for seating, and there are roughly about 350 tickets left. Jackson said they have had an equal audience of both community members and students.

"I think this is going to be wonderful," he said.

Joyce Yagerline, associate professor and director of the dance program, said she will teach adagio, a form of dance, to audience members before the show. The pre-performance lecture begins at 7 p.m. in McCain 204 and is free and open to the public.

"I will be teaching a series of exercises about adagio," she said. "Katelynn Hasler will be demonstrating the exercises and will help show how difficult pointe and dance really can be."

Yagerline said she also will tell the story of "Swan Lake" and will focus on ballet movement.

"I will go into the workings of what ballet is," she said. "I hope to educate the audience and I hope to see people there

Julia Paul, sophomore in animal science and pre-veterinary medicine, said she will attend.

"I have grown up dancing and I am really excited to see a Russian ballet," she said. "I began dancing when I was in kindergarten and stopped my senior year."

She said people should go if they are interested in dance and it would be a great chance to see a good ballet. She said she will be going with her roommates.

"I think it would be a good chance for people to see something different," she said.

Hostile environment awaits Cats at ISU

By Matthew Girard
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

K-State is 1-3 in Big 12 Conference play away from Bramlage Coliseum, and things won't get any easier for the Wildcats with a trip to Ames, Iowa, on Sunday.

The Wildcats (14-4, 4-3), who will play in their fifth conference road game of the season, take on Iowa State (12-5, 3-3) in a stadium that has been unkind to visiting opponents.

Despite a 79-64 loss to No. 9 Baylor on Wednesday, the Cyclones have dominated opponents at Hilton Coliseum. The loss to Baylor was just Iowa State's second in its past 24 games at home.

Junior Claire Coggins said the game at Iowa State will be a test, but the Wildcats should be prepared for the hostile environment.

"Texas was a huge environment for us to play that well in and Hilton is going to be another place like that, but I think our team is ready."

Along with playing in front of the conference's second-largest home crowd average (7,982 in attendance per game), the Wildcats also will have to deal with the Big 12's best field-goal shooting defense. The Cyclones are only allowing opponents to shoot 35 percent from the floor.

Offensively, Iowa State is led by junior Lindsey Medders and senior Brittany Wilkins. Medders — who scored 29 points against Baylor — is eighth in the league in scoring (16.9 points per game) and first in assists per game, averaging 8.47 assists per game. Wilkins is 12th in the Big 12 in scoring (14.3 points per game), second in three-point field goal percentage (44.7 percent) and is 11th in field goal percentage (51.9 percent).

Coggins said the K-State defense will have its hands full against Iowa State.

"They're going to try and outscore us, and that's their mentality," Coggins said. "(They score on) transitions and threes, so we are going to have to really work hard," Coggins said.

The Wildcats will counter with Coggins and freshmen Shalee Lehning and Marlies Gipson. The

BSB | K-State baseball recognized in classroom

As the K-State baseball team begins preparations for the start of the 2006 season, Coach Brad Hill announced that the squad had a banner fall in the classroom, which included four players achieving perfect 4.0 grade point averages. As a team, the Wildcats posted a 3.14 GPA this past fall, the highest ever for a Hill-coached squad.

Individually, 23 players from the 37-man roster achieved 3.0 marks or higher and were named to the Big 12 Commissioner's Honor Roll. Freshman Daniel Dellasega (business), senior B.J. Kissel (mass communications), sophomore Brett Scott (finance) and freshman Rob Vaughn (mechanical engineering) all garnering perfect 4.0 marks.

BKC | Coach fraud cases fill federal court calendar

GREAT BEND, Kan. — A slew of cases related to the federal investigation of alleged financial aid abuses by the Barton County Community College athletics program are upcoming on the federal court calendar.

David "Soupy" Campbell, former men's basketball coach, will be sentenced Feb. 13 by District Judge Monti Belot. Campbell pleaded guilty in November to one count of embezzlement for falsifying timecards so players could receive money from the federal work-study program without doing any work.

Ryan Wolf, former men's basketball coach, will be sentenced Feb. 27 by District Judge Wesley Brown. Wolf pleaded guilty in December to one count of embezzlement from a student assistance program, two counts of theft of federal funds and one count of mail fraud. The indictment alleged that from May 1998 through June 2003 Wolf used his job at the junior college to provide federal financial aid and false academic credentials to athletes.

There are six additional charges being brought against five different coaches and athletic director.

NFL | Texans introduce Kubiak as coach

HOUSTON — Gary Kubiak is coming home.

The longtime offensive coordinator of the Denver Broncos on Thursday was hired as coach of the Houston Texans.

Kubiak

Kubiak was a ballboy for the Houston Oilers and starred at Texas A&M.

The franchise owns the No. 1 overall pick in April's draft. That pick will be used on either Heisman Trophy-winning running back Reggie Bush of Southern California or Texas quarterback Vince Young, who is a Houston native.

NFL | Long killed self by drinking antifreeze

PITTSBURGH — Former Pittsburgh Steelers lineman Terry Long committed suicide by drinking antifreeze, a revised death certificate shows, and did not die as a direct result of football-related head injuries.

The Allegheny County coroner ruled in September that Long, 45, who had attempted suicide before, had died of meningitis. The condition, a swelling of the lining of Long's brain, was caused by football-related "chronic traumatic encephalopathy," also known as "punch-drunk syndrome," said the coroner at the time, Dr. Cyril Wecht.

But a revised death certificate, which Wecht's office never publicly announced, was filed Oct. 19, listing the manner of Long's death as suicide from drinking antifreeze.

NBA | Szczerbiak, Davis change teams in trade

MINNEAPOLIS — Minnesota shook up its roster Thursday, sending swingman Wally Szczerbiak to Boston for guard Ricky Davis in an exchange involving seven players and three draft picks.

Davis, Mark Blount, Marcus Banks, Justin Reed and two conditional second-round draft picks are coming to Minnesota, and in exchange the Celtics get Szczerbiak, Michael Olowokandi and Dwayne Jones and a future first-round draft pick.

Wildcat Invite up next for tracksters

By Chris Carpenter
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The K-State track team is coming off a win against rival schools Kansas and Missouri at the KSU-KU-MU Triangular, gaining momentum as it heads into the Wildcat Invitational this weekend with six athletes listed on the Trackwire.com "Dandy Dozen."

"We performed well in that meet," Coach Cliff Rovelto said. "In particular our seniors stepped up."

Trackwire.com, a Web site that follows collegiate track performances, determines the national "Dandy Dozen" for each event based on current performances, national performance lists, strength of meets and athlete history.

For the men, seniors Coby Cost, Kyle Lancaster and Christian Smith made the Dozen, along with freshman Scott Sellers. For the women, seniors Breanna Eveland Shunte Thomas made the cut.

Sellers and Lancaster, both high jumpers, have been competing closely this season. Lancaster is ranked fifth and Sellers is ranked sixth in the high-jump. Cost is tabbed as 10th in the men's weight throw, according to the Dozen.

Lancaster is automatically qualified for the NCAA Championships, while Sellers and Cost are Coach Steve Bietau said he doesn't put much into projections.

Bietau said he remembered feeling confident about his players and sophomore Olga Klimova last season after their play against Drake in the spring season opener. Klimova, as well as the entire team, was victorious in the K-State's 7-0 sweep.

Klimova, however, didn't get a chance to build on her success because, less than a week later, she tore her anterior cruciate ligament in a match against Drake.

"I remember sitting here at this time last year and it was ... right after the Drake match," Bietau said. "I was looking at Olga and thinking to myself, she could probably play (the No. 3 position) for us and win. This year's team is a little bit different. This year's team being deeper playing No. 5 may be the same as playing No. 3 last year."

"I know if Olga is playing five or six on our team we got a pretty good team."

Klimova, who was expected to miss the entire fall season, made her first appearance Sept. 30 at the Indiana Hoosier Classic in Bloomington, Ind. Klimova compiled a 3-3 singles record and a 3-7 doubles record while playing in the fall.

She has been able to come back quickly because she possesses a relentless work ethic. Bietau's job, he said is to make sure Klimova's expectations are realistic.

"She's pretty driven, and she is never really satisfied with how she plays, so the effort has always been

K-State meets Colorado in showdown for 2nd place

By Mark Potter
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

When the K-State men's basketball team takes on Colorado on Saturday in Boulder, Colo., second place in the Big 12 Conference is at stake.

Colorado (14-3, 4-2) took over sole possession of second Wednesday night with its 81-59 win over Nebraska.

After beating Missouri 79-64 last Saturday, the Wildcats (12-4, 3-2) sit a half game behind the Buffaloes. K-State also is riding a three-game winning streak.

However, Colorado has won four consecutive games and 13 of its last 15.

Wildcats have work to do before an NCAA bid comes

After three straight Big 12 Conference wins, the K-State men's basketball team is finally starting to get some attention.

In a way, Coach Jim Wooldridge's squad deserves a little hype.

The Wildcats (12-4, 3-2) are tied for third in the Big 12, just a half game behind second-place Colorado. Many think K-State is playing like a possible NCAA Tournament team.

The winning streak — which includes a road win against Kansas, a team that had embarrassed K-State for 31 consecutive games — has produced a growing optimism among K-State fans. It's tempting for Wildcat fans to buy into the buzz.

After all, K-State's Cartier Martin averages nearly 20 points per game. The Wildcats also play solid defense and rebound surprisingly well.

Did I mention they beat Kansas?

But don't be fooled — this team still has plenty of work to do. Don't jump on the K-State-to-NCAA Tournament bandwagon just yet.

The Wildcats are off to a pretty good start. So what?

GET UR' SHINE ON

Jewelry allows wearers to express personality with shimmering style

By Sheila Ellis
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Nelly's hit song "Grillz" brings to light the latest trend in bling accessories. No longer are iced-out grillz just for rappers. They are now going mainstream, with a variety of people from all walks of life flossin' gold grillz - including K-State students.

"At first I got them to cover up a tooth that I broke playing basketball," Kendrick Willis, freshman in open-option, said. "Now it is just for show. Coming up in the South as a young kid, the older guys had gold grillz, big cars and big rims. That's all you see."

A grill consists of precious materials such as gold or platinum, placed directly over teeth in the form of custom-fitted jewelry that can be taken off like dentures.

"It's just a trend. It started in the South, but now people in St. Louis, New York and California have grillz," Willis said.

People get grillz for numerous reasons - whether it be to show what hood they are from, to just wanting to stick out from the crowd.

"I just wanted to be different. Not many females have golds," Quauisha Nolen, freshman in open-option, said. "When I turn 30, I'm going to take them out to show another level of maturity and professionalism."

"Yo, we bout to start an epidemic with this one," Jermaine Dupree raps in the introduction of "Grillz."

"I think when teachers see golds, the first thing they think is 'ghetto' or 'hood,'" Nolen said. "When I see gold teeth, I think of the words 'diverse,' 'change' and 'different.'"

According to the St. Petersburg Times, this tradition of gold teeth has been a norm in the South. When rapper Flava Flav pioneered gold fronts by being one of the first rappers to wear a gold grill, other rappers followed, including Big Daddy Kane and Kool G Rap.

Over the years, rappers began flossin' flashier fronts, including platinum, diamonds and colored precious stones.

In the late '90s - after the Cash Money Millionaires came out with the now hip-hop classic "Bling, Bling" - rappers started to show their success in a new way.

"I put my money where my mouth is and bought me a grill," rapper Paul Wall explains in "Grillz."

The more platinum and gold a rapper has in their mouth, the more wealth and status they have.

"This is something that has been going on in K.C. for a long time," said Adrian Gray, owner of KC's Gold Fronts in Bannister Mall located in Kansas City, MO., and who is also known as A.G. "the jeweler". "We were the first store in KC to open that sold gold fronts in 8 years."

Grillz are removable so anyone could be a professional by day and crunk by night.

"I even have doctors and lawyers coming in to buy grillz. All races, ages, sexes and professions come in to buy golds," A.G. said.

It's not just hip-hop celebrities who are picking up on the iced-out trend. According to the Washington Post, gold grillz are being worn by celebrities such as actor Johnny Depp, who wore gold teeth for months after production wrapped on "Pirates of the Caribbean".

Although golden grillz are becoming a hot commodity nationwide, dental associations warn they might cause damage to teeth.

Jake Lippert, executive director of the Missouri Dental Association, said gold grillz might become a problem because the tooth can become subject to decay, which causes teeth to be more vulnerable to cavities.

To some, golden grillz are more than a fashion statement and might represent more than a flashy grin.

"In my 'hood' we call gold grillz 'trophy,' because they represent where we come from," Willis said.

Kansas-themed dessert can spruce up meals for state holiday

By Annette Lawless
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

For those attending any wild Kansas Day parties Sunday, this recipe might be just what you need to dazzle adults and children alike.

Many have seen some version of a Kansas Dirt recipe during the holidays or at a potluck dinner, and this spin on the recipe certainly will tickle your taste buds.

In this recipe, I have altered some contents from traditional Kansas dirt recipes to give the popular dessert a new punch, with contrasting textures and a tangy cheesecake-like filling.

Though leftovers are unlikely, the dessert can be stored in a seal-tight container for a few days.

Kansas Dirt

Time
Preparation: 30 minutes
Ready in: 2 hours

Ingredients

16 oz package Oreos, divided
8 oz package of cream cheese (softened)
1/2 cup margarine
1 cup powdered sugar
3 cups milk
1 tsp. vanilla
2-3 1/2 oz packages of vanilla instant pudding
12 oz carton of Cool Whip
Gummy worm candy (optional)

Cooking Instructions

Crush Oreos. Spread half of the cookies evenly over a 13x9 baking dish. Press into the bottom of the pan.
In a medium bowl, cream the margarine, powdered sugar and cream cheese with a blender. Continue mixing until very smooth. Set aside.

Combine milk, vanilla and instant pudding into a large bowl. Beat with mixer for one minute.
Fold creamed mixture into pudding mixture.
Fold Cool Whip into mixture.
Pour mixture over Oreos in baking pan. Spread evenly.
Sprinkle remaining Oreo crumbs on top of mixture.
Decorate with gummy worms to add a little zest to the recipe.
Refrigerate or freeze at least two hours before serving.

Change it up

■ Instead of vanilla pudding, try other flavors like chocolate, cheesecake, banana or pistachio.
■ To save a few bucks, use a generic cream cheese or Cool Whip. Cost can substitute flavor. JELL-O brand pudding and Oreos give better flavor compared to generic brands.
■ Instead of serving Kansas Dirt in a big pan, serve the dessert into small plastic tumbler cups, or better yet, small gardening buckets. Your dessert will not only be tasty, but quite festive as well.

TFA provides K-State students with teaching opportunities

By Kaley Lyon
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

When Casey Parks graduated from K-State in 2002 with a degree in anthropology, he didn't know where to go next. Then he discovered an organization called Teach For America.

"I didn't know what I wanted to do before I joined TFA," Parks said. "And now I'm pretty sure I want to be a teacher."

Parks has been teaching history to high school grade students at an alternative high school just miles away from a Navajo Indian reservation in New Mexico.

The school has an enrollment of about 300 students and serves as a second chance for area students who have been expelled or dropped out of other schools.

TFA, founded in 1990, is a national organization that strives to build the movement to eliminate educational inequity by enlisting some of the nation's most promising future leaders.

The organization consists of 3,500 TFA corps members teaching in over 1,000 schools in 22 regions.

"What TFA is expecting from corps members is for these individuals to just go into the classroom and put forth a tremendous amount of effort, to go above and beyond what might be expected from a regular teacher," Parks said.

To find these future leaders, TFA travels the nation and sponsors information sessions at many universities. Parks will have an information session for K-State at 7 p.m. Monday Jan. 30, in the K-State Student Union Sunflower room.

Students do not have to be an education major to apply for TFA. A five-week training institute will be provided for new recruits during the summer previous to the first year of teaching.

The institute prepares non-teachers by sending them into summer school classrooms for half of the day, where they gain classroom experience, and the recruits spend the rest of the day in class themselves, learning all they need to know before beginning their new job.

"There's a lot of people who aren't teachers and think they can't do this," Parks said. "While TFA is interested in getting education majors to apply, they're more interested in getting high achieving people in other fields to apply."

In addition to the teachers' salary, TFA corps members receive an additional $4,725 AmeriCorps education award for each of their two contract years, which can be used for student loan payment or for future educational pursuits.

Johnny Rothwell, senior in secondary education with an emphasis in mathematics, recently was accepted into TFA. He had never even heard of the program until he received several e-mails from the organization last year.

"I almost deleted it because I thought it was junk mail," he said with a laugh. "Then I clicked on the link, and thought it looked interesting, so I checked out the webpage."

On Jan. 5, Rothwell was placed to begin teaching in Phoenix, Arizona, which was his number one choice, he said.

During the application process, candidates have the option to specify any work-station preferences, and more than 90 percent of the time, TFA will work with these requests, Rothwell said.

Rothwell said he will report to Phoenix on June 2 and will remain there for induction week until June 9.

During that time he also will take the test required by the Arizona State Board of Education to become a certified teacher.

"It's a pretty demanding task, but I'm looking forward to it," he said.

Anna Avila, senior in kinesiology, said she decided to commit to TFA after graduation. She worked with underprivileged students last summer for Upward Bound Math-Science Program.

Avila said she also will receive training in June and will leave for Houston, Texas, where she has been assigned to teach beginning in August.

"I think this is one of those things you definitely have to have the heart to go into," she said. "If you're led in that direction it doesn't hurt to check it out - you never know what you're going to be led to do."

3rd-annual bullride honors Cushenbery

By Michlynn Rose
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

On Saturday, bull riders and bull fighters will come to Weber Arena to compete in the third-annual Brett Cushenbery Memorial Bullriding.

Admission to the event is $5 with a K-State ID. Adults are $8 and children, ages 6 to 12, are $5. The event will open at about 7 p.m. in the arena.

"Brett Cushenbery was a member of the K-State Rodeo for three years," said A.J. Griffin, director of the bullriding event. "Cushenbery grew up in Wichita and started riding bulls his senior year in high school."

On Oct. 12, 2003, a bull stepped on Cushenbery's stomach while in the third and final round of the CPR Finals in Hutchinson, Kan., Griffin said. Two days later Cushenbery passed away at the hospital.

Two professional bull riders, who have qualified for the Professional Bull Riders Finals, will climb aboard bulls to ride for eight seconds in Weber Arena on Saturday night, Griffin said.

"Jesse Schellhamer and Dave Samsel, both who have been to the PBR Finals several times, will be competing," Griffin said.

"There will also be six free-style bullfighters, two of them being PBR Finals champions."

Samsel is a former K-State student and member of the 1995 K-State rodeo team. During his professional career, he won reserve champion at the 2000 PBR World Finals.

"I have been riding bulls for 11 years with nine of those riding professionally," Samsel said. "I have qualified for the PBR Finals six times and have career earnings of $700,000."

Samsel said he is coming to the event to see family and friends because he is originally from Waterville, Kan., but now resides in Stephenville, Texas. He said he thinks it is also nice to help the cause.

Also at bullriding will be some top bulls from the PBR Finals, said Reid Green, research assistant in the Department of Animal Sciences and Industry and assistant director of the bull-riding event.

"This event benefits the KSU rodeo team through scholarships," Green said. "Last year I believe that there were two $500 scholarships given to rodeo team members."

Comedian Doug Munsell will also make an appearance.

there on her part," Bietau said. "For me with Olga, it's more of an issue of maybe helping her keep things in perspective and not expect too much too soon."

Klimova said her last singles match at the Georgia Bulldog Invitational on Sunday was a step in the right direction. Klimova defeated Mississippi State's Elna de Villiers in split sets (6-4, 3-6, 6-1).

"I wanted to play better than I did, but the last set of the singles match that I won was pretty good," Klimova

The Wildcats face Drake on Sunday at noon for the spring season opener. The duel match will be at the Cottonwood Racquet Club in Manhattan.

Sophomore Tereza Prochazkova said the team should focus on the match and not look ahead to others.

Sellers set the national high school indoor high jump record last year as a senior with a height of 7 feet 5 inches. To put that in K-State perspective, it would tie for second with Lancaster and Itai Margalit (1993) on the all-time list.

Thomas, a native of Coral Springs, Fla., won her first 400-meter dash title of the 2006 season at the Arkansas Invitational with a time of 53.94 sec-

Six track captains were selected for the 2006 season. For the women, Eveland and Thomas were selected, with seniors Avantae Arrington, Coby Cost, Lancaster and Smith selected for the men.

Cost, a weight thrower, has won 22-of-29 career competitions. Smith is ranked second in the nation in the mile run.

The meet will begin with the women's multi-events at 10 a.m. today at Ahearn Field House. Men's events will begin at 4 p.m., and the meet will pick back up on Saturday at noon.

trio have combined to average 37.3 points per game in their last three outings.

Gipson said K-State's ninth-straight win against Kansas, Wednesday, will help the Wildcats overcome their last road game.

"I think it (Kansas win) gives us confidence from our Texas loss," Gipson said. "Iowa State is a tough environment, and we just need to go in as a team and ready to go from the start."

Lehning agreed with Gipson of the importance of K-State playing together against the Cyclones.

"With the road games that we have had, especially playing at Texas, we know the magnitude that it's going to be and we just have to make sure we pull together as a team," Lehning said. "It's something that, when you have thousands of fans screaming against you, that the 11 or 12 of us need to pull together."

TOURNAMENT | Wildcat wins are unimpressive

The truth is, none of K-State's wins are very impressive.

K-State hasn't defeated any teams in ESPN.com's Ratings Percentage Index (RPI) Top 50.

Colorado State, with an RPI of 66, is statistically the best team K-State has beaten — it was a four-point blowout Dec. 7 at Bramlage Coliseum.

Kansas (12-6, RPI 113) is clearly not the usual top 25 force K-State is accustomed to facing. New Mexico (12-6, RPI 103) also is having a down year. Texas A&M (12-5, RPI 75) and Missouri (10-7, RPI 82) are fine teams, but I doubt either will finish in the top half of the Big 12.

Let's disregard K-State's win against Kansas for a moment.

After all, rivalries are unpredictable and hard to interpret.

Barring that game, the Wildcats simply have won games they should have won, which is what good teams are supposed to do.

The problem is, K-State also has lost games it should have won, and I'm not talking about the ugly 57-42 loss to Nebraska. That game clearly was some sort of nightmarish fluke.

I'm talking about K-State's other three losses — the ones that weren't flukes.

To be a good team, you must steal a few games on the road, which K-State has yet to prove it can do.

Sure, the Wildcats beat Kansas at Allen Fieldhouse, but that is K-State's only road win of the season. Three road losses by a combined nine points equal a definite cause for concern.

If K-State would have pulled off a win at Washington State or Iowa State, I would not be concerned. Even a win at Northern Illinois would have given me a little more confidence.

The Wildcats have proven they can beat almost any team that comes to Bramlage. But K-State's ability to win crucial road games, like Saturday against Colorado (14-3, 4-2), will decide its fate regarding a berth in the NCAA Tournament.

Starting tomorrow, K-State has six road games remaining in conference play. My guess is the Wildcats will need to win at least three of them or they can kiss their NCAA Tournament hopes goodbye.

If K-State beats Colorado on Saturday, I'm all aboard the K-State-NCAA dance train. But until the Wildcats prove they can win another road game, I have no choice but to remain skeptical.

Mark Potter is a senior in public relations. You can e-mail him at sports@pub.ksu.edu.

SCHEDULE | Football ticket packages available unchanged in price at $143 and go on sale March 27, when fall enrollment begins through KATS.

"We want students to be as positive as they can, but really come and be a part of the game, just like you have at some of these other places where the students or the fans really are a factor in your game-planning because of crowd noise," Prince said.

K-State will again offer its popular "Young Alumni" season ticket package for $178 to recent K-State graduates who purchased season tickets during their time as a student.

Single-game ticket prices for the Illinois State, Florida Atlantic and Marshall games are $35 per game. The Louisville, Oklahoma State and Iowa State games are priced at $55, with the Nebraska and Texas games costing $70.

Tickets may be purchased in person at the K-State Athletic Ticket Office in Bramlage Coliseum or by calling (800) 221-CATS.

THRIFT | College students discover bargains

"We made bank in Kansas City," Porter said. "Where else can you get a three-piece suit for $5?"

Porter said she also began shopping at thrift stores in high school.

"I started going to thrift stores in high school," Porter said. "One Saturday afternoon, my best friend and I said, 'Let's go shopping,' and then it just became a weekly ritual."

Roger Andres, co-owner of Grand Ol' Trunk Thrift Shop, 1304 Pillsbury Dr., said high school and college students are frequent shoppers at his store.

"A lot of them come for theme parties and for furniture, too," Andres said. "They come in probably for wild clothes, like retro clothes and polyester."

The furniture and appliances at the Grand Ol' Trunk Thrift Shop and Bookstore are bought from estate sales and other venues, but all clothes are donations, Andres said.

An influx of thrift store popularity has been constant for years, Andres said, although there used to be a hesitancy with some people.

"Everybody goes to thrift stores," he said. "There used to be a stigma about going, but now it seems everyone goes."

Andres said thrift store shopping is for those who are looking for items out of the ordinary.

"We get off-the-wall stuff all the time," he said. "One time we had a moose-foot ash tray. It was two feet tall."

Did the ashtray sell?

"Of course," Andres said. "There's a home for everything."

tough to beat," Wright said. "They have a good guard in Richard Roby, and they have a lot of guys who can spread the floor and shoot the three."

Roby, a sophomore who is averaging 23.3 points in Big 12 play, leads Colorado's offensive attack that ranks fourth in the conference.

Colorado has made more three-pointers (61) in conference play than any other Big 12 team — 42 more than K-State. Roby has made 21 three-pointers in the last six games and boasts the third-best three-point percentage in the league at .457. Roby comes off a 30-point performance against Nebraska and has earned three straight Big 12 Player of the Week awards.

Coach Jim Wooldridge assigned Wright the task of slowing Roby.

"I am still going to play aggressive on Roby and try to make him work hard, just like I did with (Missouri's) Gardner," Wright said. "I want to try and limit his touches, get a hand up and contest his shots."

"I am pretty confident in guarding anyone in this league," he said. "I'm up for any challenge."

K-State's defense is only giving up 60.4 points in Big 12 play, good for third in the conference. In addition, K-State ranks second in the conference in field goal percentage defense at .356.

"We are committed to the defensive end," sophomore guard Clint Stewart said. "We definitely take pride in our defense."

"Coach said, 'Some nights you just aren't going to shoot well, but you can't control that. The things you can control are rebounding and defense.'"

Along with perimeter defense, rebounding is crucial to victory against Colorado, sophomore guard David Hoskins said.

"I think we need to rebound most of all since they're a long, athletic team," Hoskins said. "They shoot really well, so I think if we rebound, we will be all right and everything else will fall into place."

K-State ranks fifth in the Big 12 with an average of 36.6 rebounds per game, while Colorado ranks second at a clip of 39.5 per game.

One advantage K-State might have over Colorado involves fatigue — Colorado played Wednesday; the Wildcats will have had a week between games.

"We would rather play twice a week, but we put everything we had into the Missouri game, so it was good to get some rest," Wright said.

Bond proposals due Friday

By Adrienne DeWeese
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Proposals for the $1.5 million student fee bond surplus are being accepted until Friday.

Student Body President Michael Burns said students pay off bonds that were used to renovate Peters Recreation Complex, the K-State Student Union and Hale Library through privilege fees each year.

Twenty-five percent of the payment is placed in a reserve, which would be used in the case of a university emergency, like half of the student body leaving K-State, Burns said.

"Over the past few years, the account has accrued a lot of money," he said. "We're not sure how much is in the account exactly, but it's enough to spend $1.5 million."

The Student Fee Bond Surplus Committee is composed of 13 students who were appointed at the end of fall 2005. These students represent the greek system, student government, residence halls and different racial groups.

E-mail scam targets KSU students

By Brandon R. Gonzalez
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Last week K-State was threatened by a new e-mail phishing scam, which took aim at K-State students and faculty members.

"This scam was targeted specifically at K-Staters," said Aimee Hagedorn, communications coordinator for the Information Technology Center. "(It) shows us how serious phishing has become, and how deceptively realistic these messages that have been created by criminals are."

Several students and staff were sent e-mails, which appeared to be from K-State Federal Credit Union, 1455 Anderson Ave. and 2600 Anderson Ave.

The e-mail informed recipients that access to their online accounts had been blocked due to log-in failures.

K-Staters were directed to a fake log-in page, which asked for their username, password and debit card number for verification.

Sold-out performance features Darrell Scott

By Adrienne DeWeese
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Country singer Darrell Scott performed to a sold-out audience Saturday night in the BirdHouse Acoustic Music Series at the Manhattan Arts Center.

A Grammy Award-winning songwriter, Scott wrote "Long Time Gone" for the Dixie Chicks.

Scott, a Nashville, Tenn., resident, also has written songs for Garth Brooks, Tim McGraw and Faith Hill.

David Kamerer, BirdHouse founder, said Scott has performed in the BirdHouse Acoustic Music Series twice before and sold out both shows.

"He is an artist of very high stature," Kamerer said. "We want him to come back as often as possible."

The BirdHouse Acoustic Music Series, now in its 11th season, features jazz, blues, folk and country musicians.

"All the fakeness of pop music is stripped away," Kamerer said of the performance series. "It allows you to get the purest sense of the song."

During the first set, Scott performed "Family Tree," a song he wrote before his third child was born.

Scott said he and his wife already had two children, and it was a moment of surrender that another was on the way.

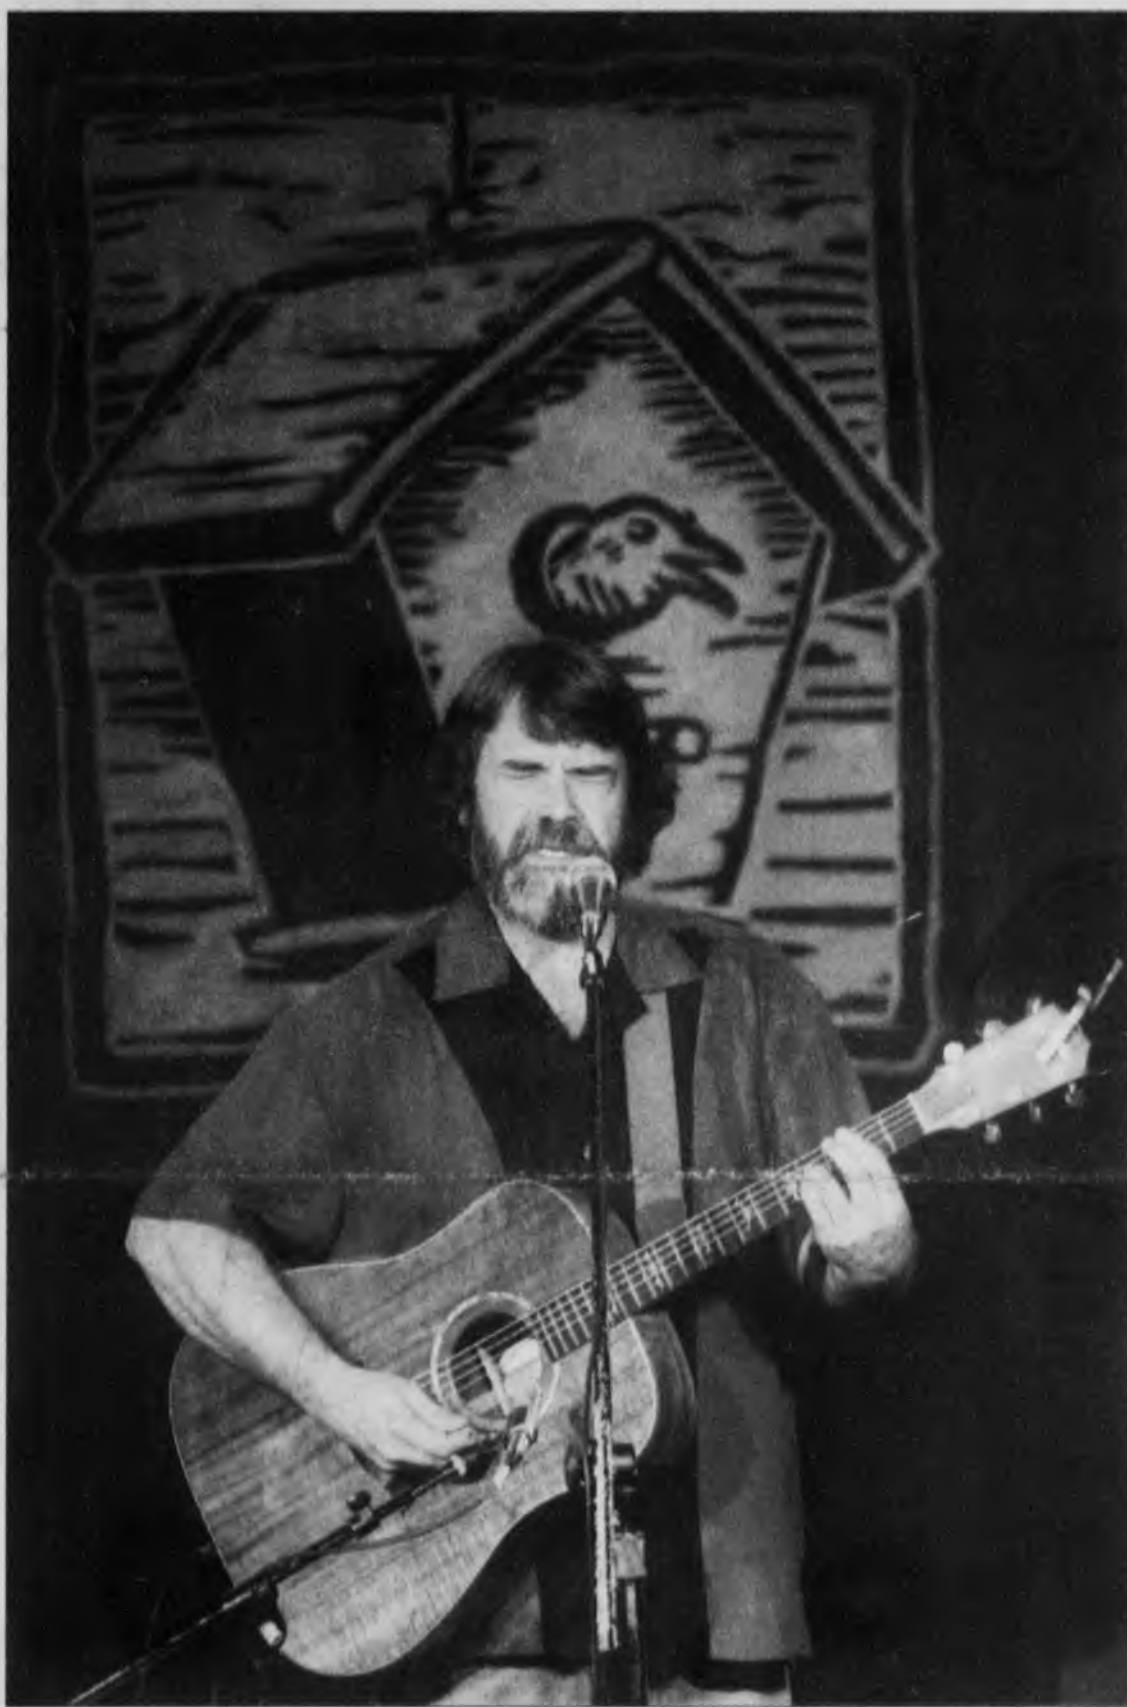

"But now he's 10 years old, and I wouldn't trade him for the world," Scott said.

Scott, who started making music at age 6, said he came from a musical family and his father also was a songwriter.

Each instrument has its own method for writing songs, said Scott, who plays the guitar, banjo, mandolin and piano.

"In case you guys haven't figured it out, I'm making this up as I go," Scott said during his second set as he took requests

Music highlights Chinese Spring Festival

Alina Zheng was prepared for the Mice Versus Tigers dance at the Chinese Spring Festival.

Zheng, 6, wore black felt mouse ears and had whiskers painted on her face, as did her sister, Amy, 10.

The festival was Sunday in the K-State Union Forum Hall, and Alina and Amy performed as mice in the dance.

"When I perform, I like seeing people's happy faces," Amy said.

The festival was organized by the Chinese Student and Scholar Association, and co-organized by the Chinese Program and the Department of Modern Languages.

In addition to Chinese dances and ballads, there was also a performance by the Japanese Yosakoi Dance Club.

"A significant number of students in the Chinese language program are Japanese," said David Graff, associate professor of history.

A member of the dance club used his Chinese language skills to address the audience.

"I'm very pleased to be with you all, and happy Spring Festival," he said in Chinese.

The greeting was translated by Wei Wu, Chinese language instructor in the modern languages department.

There was some concern with Japanese students performing in a Chinese festival, due to the tensions between the two countries, Graff said.

The Chinese Spring Festival celebrates the Chinese New Year, and this year in the Lunar New Year is the year of the dog.

Most performers wore red, which is a Chinese celebration color, Wu said.

Many Chinese citizens in China watch the celebrations on television, Graff said.

"This is the local equivalent of people watching on television in China," he said.

Wu said the year is like a beast: it comes out and eats people, and in the New Year celebration, fireworks are set off to scare the beast away.

Professors from the mathematics, geography, mechanical engineering and other departments performed in the festival, Wu said.

A song was performed by the Chinese School, as well as ballads from four different areas of China.

66 dead after roof collapses in Poland

Janek Skarzynski | AFP

The roof of an exhibition hall in Chorzow collapsed during a racing pigeon show, probably under the weight of heavy snow.

Rescuers abandoned hope Sunday of finding survivors beneath the wreckage of an exhibition hall that collapsed and killed 66 people. Authorities were bringing in heavy equipment to demolish what little remained of the building.

The structure collapsed Saturday afternoon with an estimated 500 people inside.

ABC JOURNALIST, CAMERAMAN INJURED IN IRAQ EXPLOSION

ABC "World News Tonight" co-anchor Bob Woodruff and a cameraman were seriously injured Sunday when the Iraqi Army vehicle they were traveling in was attacked with an explosive device.

Both journalists suffered head injuries, and Woodruff also has broken bones. They were in stable condition following surgery at a U.S. military hospital in Iraq, ABC News President David Westin said.

GOP SENATOR CALLS FOR SPYING EXPLANATION FROM BUSH

A Republican member of the Senate Intelligence Committee said Sunday that President Bush has explaining to do on his domestic spy program and questioned the administration's assertion of broad executive power.

Sen. Chuck Hagel, R-Neb., said he remains unconvinced that Bush could allow the program without fully consulting with the courts or Congress.

RICE RULES OUT U.S. AID TO HAMAS

U.S. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice on Sunday ruled out any American financial aid to a Hamas government in the Palestinian territories and said Washington wants Arab nations and others to cut off money as well.

Humanitarian aid to the Palestinians, many of whom are poor and unemployed, is likely on a "case-by-case basis," Rice said.

Hamas, or the Islamic Resistance Movement, won a decisive majority in last week's Palestinian legislative elections.

IRAN SAYS TALKS, NOT THREATS, ARE KEY TO RESOLVING CONCERNS

Iran pressed for more negotiations over its nuclear program Sunday and warned that harsh measures would spawn harsh reactions as diplomacy intensified days before an international meeting on whether to refer the issue to the U.N. Security Council.

Foreign Ministry spokesman Hamid Reza Asefi said the door was open for a compromise.

LAWYERS AIM FOR AN IMPARTIAL JURY FOR LAY, SKILLING TRIAL

Of the more than 100 potential jurors slated to pack a federal courtroom Monday in Houston, attorneys must find a dozen who aren't already convinced that Enron Corp. founder Kenneth Lay and former CEO Jeffrey Skilling are crooks and liars.

"If we get 12 people who haven't made up their minds, we like our chances," Daniel Petrocelli, Skilling's lead trial lawyer, said.

Students help teach future female scientists, engineers

GROW program encourages girls' interest in math, science

By Hannah Crippen
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Sixty-eight female middle-school students attended a Girls Researching Our World program, "Engineers and Scientists to the Rescue" Saturday.

Susan Arnold Christian, GROW program coordinator, has been with the program since 2002.

"The goal of the program is for the girls to have a seamless transition from GROW to EXCITE (Exploring Science, Technology and Engineering) and then to come to K-State and major in science and engineering," Christian said. "It's all about getting them through GROW and EXCITE and keeping them connected."

EXCITE is a program similar to GROW. It is for high school girls, and it works to prepare them for college.

Christian and Kimberly Douglas, director and associate professor of Engineering, gave the girls an introduction to the day's activities and objectives during the opening session in Fiedler Hall.

They also showed a video about a female scientist who works with volcanoes.

Douglas, an industrial engineer, explained to the girls why she feels her job is important and why she wanted to be an engineer.

"I wanted to be able to make the world a better place," Douglas said.

During the presentation, Christian and Douglas asked the girls what problems people face because of natural disasters.

They said the goal of the day was to teach the girls how to prepare for natural disasters and relief efforts and the important roles of scientists and engineers in such situations.

The girls were split into nine Rescue Groups facilitated by K-State engineering and science students. Workshops took place in Ackert, Durland, Seaton, Rathbone, and Fiedler halls.

The groups were each given names according to their subjects: The Mold that GROWS, Water Doctors, Foodborne Illness, Supply Distribution, Tornado Paths, Networking, Water Resource Engineering, Don't Get Blown to Oz and State Fair. Each group dealt with a different issue that affects scientists and engineers.

One group, The Mold that GROWS, did an experiment involving mold walls that had been sitting in Tuttle Creek for three weeks and had collected mold.

The girls did tape peels on the walls and looked at the mold under a microscope. This rescue group simulated a flood victim's house.

Another group, Water Doctors, did biological tests on water to make sure it was safe to drink. The group made filters out of sand, cotton balls, gravel, paper towels and cloth to strain dirty water through. The girls looked at the organisms in the water through a microscope.

The other groups researched on bacteria that can make people sick, studied measures that were taken during Hurricane Katrina, learned about tornadoes, buffer zones and siren placement, simulated a tsunami in a large tub and built a water pump.

As part of the Water Doctors module inside Ackert Hall Saturday, Tana Bolan, 14, inspects the contaminated water that has run through her homemade filter of sand, paper towels, gravel and cotton balls as part of the Girls Researching Our World workshop. The program was held to give middle school girls experience in science, engineering, technology and mathematics.

During the closing ceremony, Kimberly Kramer, assistant professor of architectural engineering and construction science, talked to the students about her career and asked them about what they learned throughout the day.

Christian said there will be another event in April that will focus on how science and engineering connect with music and the arts.

Jade Ryan, a sixth-grade student at Fort Riley Middle School, said she signed up for GROW through her Girl Scout troop. Ryan said she would like to be a part of EXCITE when she goes to high school, and said she enjoyed the opportunity to work with K-State engineers.

"It was very exciting for me because I was very excited to go here and actually meet the people that go through the school and the K-State classes," Ryan said. "You get to carry this stuff with you forever. The GROW program is very good for girls because it gets them ready for what they want to be."

She said her favorite Rescue Group was Supply Distribution.

"The people who instructed it were very cool, and we got to deal with something we might do in the future if we decide to do that," Ryan said.

Christian said she was pleased with the outcome of the day.

"The survey information from the December event showed that the girls left the day with the impression that scientists and engineers really do make the world a better place," Christian said.

Stephanie Young, graduate student in anatomy and physiology designed the State Fair group activities and also helped during the December GROW event.

"I really enjoy being a role model for young people in any field," Young said. "I had a lot of good role models as a child."

The GROW Project began in 1999 with funding from the National Science Foundation and work by four K-State faculty members and administrators. Its first summer workshop was in 2000. Since 2002 it has been a year-round program.

Blue Key self-improvement program begins

By Sheila Ellis
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Catalyst, a semester-long program run by Blue Key Honor Society members, began Saturday with a kick-off retreat in the Hemisphere Room of Hale Library.

The program is designed to promote success skills and self-confidence and establish lifetime goals and time management skills along with other life skills.

The event marked the beginning of a semester-long experience that helps freshmen and sophomores develop themselves.

It is focused on Sean Covey's book, "The Seven Habits of Highly Effective Teens," as well as supplementary articles and books.

"Seventy-three students turned in applications and seventy-three got accepted," said Ryan Flickner, Catalyst director and senior in agronomy.

"Whoever turned in their applications and spent the time and effort to turn in an application got accepted."

Each Catalyst member creates a personal mission statement that establishes a lifetime goal, 30-year goal, five year, one year and so on, Flickner said.

Franklin Covey the company that published Covey's book, provides many of the world's leading private and public sector organizations with professional services.

Lonnie Moore, a Franklin Covey global trainer and motivational speaker, was the featured lecturer at the event.

Moore's lecture revolved around the teachings of Covey's book.

The book is tailored to high school graduates entering college, Flickner said.

Students filled out interactive handouts while Moore lectured. The handouts explained the seven habits discussed in the book.

"I am a national trainer specifically in education, training students nationwide," Moore said. "What I teach is finding your passion and focusing on picking something you want to do."

Moore said his mission in life is to help young people.

"Sometimes young people may get stuck mentally," he said, "the reason why Michael Jordan is so good is because he has passion about what he does."

Students in attendance said they learned a lot during the three-hour session.

"I've learned that Catalyst is more than developing yourself," Nathan Harms, freshman in physics, said. "Instead it's about relationships with others."

TO THE POINT Students should submit proposal for fee allocation

More than $1.5 million has accumulated in student fee bond surplus, and students are getting a chance to say how they want that money spent.

Proposals for how the surplus will be used are due by 4 p.m. Friday in the Office of Student Activities and Services in the K-State Student Union.

This is an excellent opportunity to have a say about where extra student dollars are going.

Remember the Center for Student Activities that almost slipped through the system last year? That was going to be paid for with the money from the student fee bond surplus.

Luckily, the CSA didn't pass, but if students don't voice their opinions on what they want done with the surplus, something similar to the CSA issue could happen again.

That is why it is important for students to voice their opinions and to get involved. It doesn't matter if they're involved with the Student Governing Association because proposals will be accepted from all students.

So get creative and think of an idea that will benefit all students, or your proposal won't be selected.

After all, it's time our money is used for something we want.

To the point is an editorial selected and debated by the editorial board and written after a majority opinion is formed. This is the Collegian's official opinion.

Americans have long maintained the majestic image of hardworking citizens.

Those Americans go out every day and work themselves to the point of exhaustion. Their pay is substantially less than those sitting in offices above them, but they're proud to be Americans and they accept this as how life has to be.

This image has become heroic in America, and rightly so.

The people who live the working-class life in our country are its backbone and deserve our respect. But year after year this respect continues to end at the checkbook. According to a new study by the Center on Budget and Policy Priorities and the Economic Policy Institute, the income gap between rich and poor has continued to increase.

This study, titled "Pulling Apart," doesn't stop at just showing troubling news for our nation. It is one of the few studies that also went through the work of separating data by state. If you haven't already heard, we have nothing to be proud of in Kansas.

The gap between the richest 20 percent and the poorest 20 percent of people in Kansas is only the 28th largest in America.

Sure, you might say we're in the better half of the country, but the study also takes into consideration how much worse it has become since 1980. The income inequality in Kansas is the 13th fastest-growing in the nation.

In the early '80s, rich Kansans made 4.5 times more than the poor. Sure, if you believe this number should never surpass three, like I do, it's still disheartening. But even if you disagree with me, you have to admit that the 6.5 ratio we now face is far too great.

This means that between 1980 and the early 2000s, the annual income of the poorest 20 percent of the people in our state increased by about $100 per year. Basically, if you made $16,139 in the early '80s, you would have made $18,284 a few years ago.

The rich, however, have seen their incomes rise by $2,260 a year.

That's right. In just one year the incomes of the richest 20 percent of Kansas increased more than those of the poorest 20 percent in more than 20 years. In the same amount of time, the highest incomes have grown from $72,241 to $119,639.

I was raised to believe I could become anything I wanted.

I believed everyone in this country was truly equal and that I had just as much of a chance to become president as any other kid in the United States.

This was before I learned about money. And it truly is necessary to have money in order to obtain more.

We can't allow this gap to spread any further.

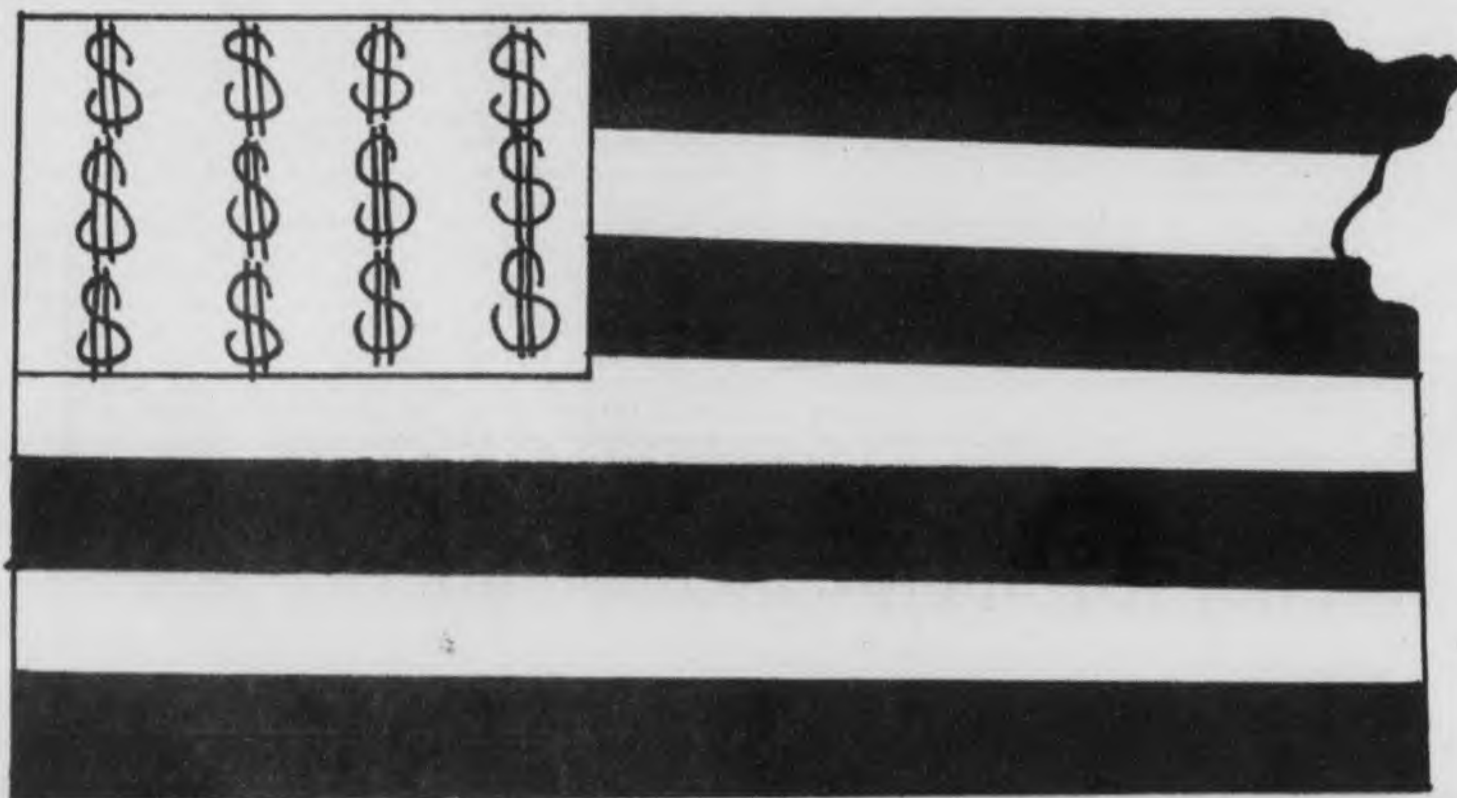

As far as I know, our economy was just fine in the early '80s when Kansas' ratio was only 4.5:1.

Whether it's done by raising the minimum wage or reworking President Bush's tax system back in favor of the little guy, something has to be done.

Music improves students' journey to class

We see them everywhere around campus: people wearing headphones.

Some of these headphones attempt to make quite the fashion statement with their miniscule size (who doesn't think tiny headphones are sexy?).

DANIEL KIRKSEY

Others are so enormous it's a mystery anyone would even consider wearing them in public. Why do they do it?

Of course, the obvious answer is that they like to listen to music, but it goes deeper than that. I tried it myself and found the experience quite rewarding.

As I walked from my first class listening to the Smashing Pumpkins' song "Thirty-Three," I realized that listening to music while walking completely altered my being.

I no longer was one of the monotonous masses doing the same old hike to class.

Suddenly, no one else really existed; I could see everyone, but they all seemed unimportant and secondary. They were like the toy-size cars seen while staring down from an airplane in awe of the Smoky Mountains.

All the people were there, but it was now my world. Are they unaware of their surroundings? Do they refuse to exist in the reality of this world with all of their senses and everyone else?

No. These headphone-toting people are not self-absorbed schmucks, they're just dreamers.

These dreamers are caught up in their moment of bliss when everything seems like it's going to be okay.

They feel anxious, but in a good way. They are marked by the out-of-place smile they sometimes cannot hold back at the thought of the next moment.

Their walk no longer is the walk of the masses.

Singled out by the careful eye, their defined rhythm from step to step has become a dance.

Music, it seems, has become these dreamers' drug of choice.

To most, they are no different from everyone else they see. They are headphone-wearing college students probably dealing with the same dilemmas.

They are annoyed by the obnoxious self-proclaimed brainiac sitting in the front row of class.

The complexities of the chaos theory are just as much of a mystery to them. And they can't understand their significant other's idiosyncrasies, just like you.

However, in their minds, they are standing on the precipice of hope, waiting to jump into every moment with a zeal not unlike the typical liberal.

You know the type: those at a vegetarian-fundraising banquet complete with organic tofu and hand-sewn hemp tablecloths in benefit of the murderer Stanley "Tookie" Williams. One of these dreamers might be a friend of yours to whom you extend a hello, without the slightest reply in return.

You might even feel like he looked right at you before rudely ignoring you, but don't take it personally; he simply looked right through you.

So it is that some people are unsatisfied with eavesdropping on phone conversations.

They don't care to sort out others' barely-memorable details of the previous weekend's kegger; how much more meaningless and empty could life get?

Who wouldn't choose to take an hourly dose of musical cocaine instead?

These dreamers in stereo are not unfriendly, just focused on another reality: a reality perhaps better than others'.

Loss to Buffaloes lands Cats in 4th place

By Angie Hanson
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Saturday's game against Colorado was going to determine a few things for K-State.

If victorious, the game would bump Colorado out of the No. 2 spot in the Big 12 Conference and solidify K-State's position in second place. The game also would prove the Cats were legitimate and could compete outside of Bramlage Coliseum.

But there was no Rocky-Mountain high for K-State this weekend, as the Buffaloes ended the Cats' three-game winning streak with a 79-75 loss.

With the defeat, K-State is in a three-way tie for fourth place in the Big 12 with Nebraska and Texas Tech, and Colorado stands alone at No. 2.

Coach Jim Wooldridge said he was not happy with Saturday's loss.

"I am not going to lose the next week," Wooldridge said. "We cannot accept how we played. We have to move on."

Juniors Lance Harris and Cartier Martin couldn't bail the Cats out of this one, despite their combined 47 points, including 8-of-12 from the three-point arc.

The Buffaloes outplayed the Wildcats and held them to Wildcats learning how to win big games

From the look of things Sunday afternoon, the K-State women's basketball team finally might have figured out how to win a big game in the Big 12 Conference.

The Wildcats downed Iowa State 73-64 at Hilton Coliseum in Ames, Iowa, and it's becoming obvious that they have learned from earlier setbacks on the road.

No, it wasn't K-State's first Big 12 road win. That came when K-State beat Oklahoma State 67-57 on Jan. 18.

But as far as women's basketball goes, Oklahoma State is no Iowa State, and Gallagher-Iba Arena is certainly no Hilton Coliseum.

Even with K-State's win, Iowa State is still 58-17 at home against Big 12 opponents in the 10-year history of the league, and K-State's victory was just its third in Ames in Big 12 play.

Also, earlier this season, the Wildcats fell on the road to Missouri (68-42), Texas A&M (66-39) and Texas (71-70 in overtime).

Based purely on facts, K-State's win against the Cyclones was huge.

However, what it means most is that K-State is learning from each game.

After being blown out by Missouri, the Wildcats came back to play Texas A&M, and while the score doesn't indicate it, K-State played better against the Aggies.

K-State fought hard against Texas, but two missed free throws from freshman guard Shalee Lehnung at the end of regulation doomed K-State.

A close 69-63 victory against Kansas taught the Wildcats another lesson: If you have a big lead, don't slack off.

Which leads to Sunday's win.

The Wildcats played incredibly the first 30 minutes of the game and even led by as much as 24 points with slightly less than 15 minutes left to play.

But the Cyclones came back behind a 22-6 run, and it looked as if the young Wildcats would fall apart.

However, juniors Claire Coggins and Twigg McIntyre were nails in the final five minutes.

Coggins hit a 3-pointer to stop an Iowa State push,

KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

After dominant first-half play, K-State survived a barrage of late scoring and beat the Iowa State Cyclones to win its second Big 12 Conference road game of the season, 73-64.

Behind 10 early second-half points from junior Claire Coggins, the Cats (15-4, 5-3) were able to build the lead to 24 points. However, the Cyclones (12-6, 3-4) rebounded, going on a 22-6 run to slice the score to 59-51.

"On defense, we just weren't talking on the screens," freshman Marlies Gipson said.

Hilton Coliseum has not been kind to the Cats during Coach Deb Patterson's era, with K-State only boasting a 3-7 record when playing in Ames, Iowa.

Although the second-half scoring tightened the spread, the first half belonged entirely to the Wildcats.

It took three minutes for Iowa State to score its first points of the game and with less than 12 minutes to play in the half, K-State took command by going on a 22-1 run to make the score 36-16 late in the first half.

"It was definitely an exciting time,"

Nasal, cough relief

Comparison, education important when selecting cold medications

By Lori Woolery
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

As if a runny nose and watery eyes are not enough to handle during a cold, finding the right type of over-the-counter medication can make the situation even more unbearable.

Kristin Badders, Walgreens pharmacist, said it is important to select the right type of cold medication based on individual needs. One cold medication might work for one person, but it may not work for another.

"There's no one best cold medicine," Badders said. "It just depends on what your symptoms are and any other underlying health conditions you might have."

With hundreds of over-the-counter cold medications available, the best advice is to ask the pharmacist, Badders said. Other medications a person takes while using an over-the-counter medication could lessen the effect of the drug.

She also said the circumstances determine what type of medication works best.

"If they have to stay awake and stay alert, then we have to take it into account whether the medication will cause drowsiness or not," Badders said.

There are five common ingredients found in cold and cough medications: cough suppressants, antihistamines, decongestants, expectorants and analgesics, like Tylenol. Each treats a different symptom of a cold, and each has its own side effects.

Cough suppressants are used to trigger a reflex in the brain. Any cough medicine containing dextromethorphan will work to suppress the cough in the brain, so a person doesn't feel the need to cough as much, she said.

"It may cause drowsiness," Badders said. "That is probably the most frequent side effect of that medication."

Antihistamines are used to help relieve runny noses, sneezing, watery eyes and itching, she said. They are good to use for the treatment of colds, allergies and allergic reactions.

The older antihistamine brand, like Benadryl, can cause drowsiness, thickened secretions and dry mouth, she said. Contact lens wearers could have irritated eyes because of the side-effects of antihistamines.

"Claritin, which is a newer antihistamine, has less of the sedation side effect, but probably you will still experience some dryness and dry eyes," Badders said.

However, some of the newer antihistamines don't cause drowsiness, she said.

Barry Farvis, owner and pharmacist of Barry's Drug Center, 414 Poyntz Ave.

"You could find five different ingredients in one product," Farvis said. "Depending on which component is involved depends on what side effects you might feel."

Expectorants try to promote the evacuation of phlegm from the airway when the patient is having trouble coughing up mucus, Farvis said. It works to make a more productive cough.

Decongestants try to break up congestion by opening nasal passages, he said. They tend to have the reverse side effect of antihistamines, making the person hyper or keeping him or her awake.

Some of the decongestant products are only sold behind the counter at most pharmacies, he said.

Pseudoephedrine, a common ingredient in decongestants, is used in the production of methamphetamines and is only sold to adults ages 18 and older. Photo identification is required to buy pseudoephedrine products.

It's just another reason to consult a pharmacist first, Farvis said.

"Some of the better products may not be available on the shelves," Farvis said. "What you need may not even be out there."

Paul Hayden, pharmacist at Medicine Shoppe Pharmacy, said the delivery methods for cold medications—liquid, pills or tablets—don't make a difference in the effectiveness of the drug.

"If the same ingredients are in all of them, the liquid tends to absorb a little bit faster," Hayden said. "The gel-caps would probably be next and the tablets a little bit slower."

The best way to pick the right type of cold medication is to go to the professionals and ask a pharmacist.

"I would suggest, emphatically, that the students purchase that at a place where there is a professional that could advise them on the product," Farvis said.

Relieving a cough

■ Coughing is your body's way of getting foreign substances and mucus out of your lungs and upper airway passages. Coughs are useful, and you should not try to eliminate them. Sometimes, though, coughs are severe enough to make breathing difficult, cause vomiting or prevent rest. Home treatment can help you feel more comfortable when you have a cough.

■ Drink more fluids. Water helps loosen mucus and soothe an irritated throat. Dry, hacking coughs respond to honey in hot water, tea or lemon juice.

■ Elevate your head with extra pillows at night to ease a dry cough.

■ Try a cough drop to soothe an irritated throat. Expensive medicine-flavored cough drops are not any better than inexpensive candy-flavored ones or hard candy. Most cough drops have no effect on the cough-producing mechanism.

■ Avoid exposure to inhaled irritants, such as smoke, dust or other pollutants, or wear a face mask that is appropriate for the exposure.

Artist breaks out of bland genre with new album

"Let It Die"

Album review by Mark Sibilla

The music industry churns out so many bland singer-songwriters that coffee shops across the nation will never have to worry about running out of troubadours clutching guitars and singing wistfully about unrequited loves as they cry into their mochaccinos.

It is refreshing to stumble across those singer-songwriters who rock the boat musically and lyrically.

One budding female star has done just that.

Leslie Feist's wonderfully diverse "Let It Die" is pure indie rock gold.

Feist has made a name for herself in the independent music scene. She lives with and DJs for Peaches, raps alongside MC Chilly Gonzales and is a member of indie rock darlings Broken Social Scene.

With Feist's ability to transverse so many styles successfully, it was anyone's guess as to what "Let It Die" would sound like. Contrary to Feist's earlier work, "Let It Die" is fairly subdued but still manages to hop genres in almost every track.

One would think that with such variety, "Let It Die" would lose coherence, but Feist's beautifully emotive voice holds it together.

Album opener "Gatekeeper" is a simple strummed guitar pattern in which Feist cleverly sings about a summer romance that, figuratively, freezes in the winter.

"Mushaboom," a romantic song propelled by guitar and joyous handclaps, follow. Feist is searching for "A man who will stick it out/And make a home from a rented house." The bridge of the song features a wonderful guitar melody and saloon-style piano breakdown.

The title track is a starkly beautiful ballad similar to Sinead O'Connor's cover of "Nothing Compares 2 U."

When Feist sings "The saddest part of a broken heart/Isn't the ending so much as the start," one can hear the pain cutting through her vocals.

While the first half of the album contains original numbers, the remainder includes an array of newly-arranged covers.

After the traditional song "When I Was a Young Girl," Feist covers Ron Sexsmith's "Secret Heart."

Feist closes the album with a cover of Blossom Dearie's bittersweet "Now At Last." It is a simple throwback to the jazzy lounge singers of the 1950s.

Feist's breakthrough album is a wonderful menagerie of diverse styles and affecting vocals. It could be debated that an album containing more originals would have been preferred, but as "Let It Die" is a strong album by a talented artist.

Italian prime minister promises to give up sex

ROME — Italian Prime Minister Silvio Berlusconi is famous for his ambitious promises, but he is unlikely to be called to task if he breaks his latest pledge: not to have sex before the April 9 general election.

The twice-married Berlusconi, 69, prides himself on his physical fitness, and after a facelift and a hair transplant he looks younger now than he did when he swept to power in 2001.

He has often been criticized by commentators and feminist groups for his use of sexual innuendo and sexist jokes.

from the audience. Scott said he does not have set lists for his performances, and most of the time he does not know what his first song will be.

Scott received a standing ovation from the audience at the end of his second set.

With past BirdHouse musician Ken White on the banjo, Scott performed a 15-minute encore song, "Old Joe Clark."

Scott also performed two songs off his new album

"Hank Williams' Ghost," due out in April.

The inspiration for Scott's music comes from things he is thinking about or working out in his mind, he said.

Jared Gile, K-State alumnus, said he thinks Scott is a talented songwriter.

"He could make a living as just one of them, but he's just that good at both of them," said Gile, an alternative country and folk musician who opened for Scott at a show in Courtland, Kan. "He's too good to be an inspiration of mine."

44.8 percent from the field on the game and just 66.7 percent from the free-throw line.

Once again, the Cats gave up eight points at the line.

Rather than stick to the 2-3 zone Wooldridge had been implementing, K-State switched to a man-to-man defense. The defense proved ineffective for the Cats, considering four Buffaloes scored in double digits, led by standout Richard Roby with 18.

The Cats only led once by one point at the 19:32 mark in the second half but managed to stay close to the Buffs throughout the game. K-State battled back from multiple deficits, the largest being nine at the 11:03 mark in the first half.

In the waning minutes of the game, senior Dramane Diarra hit a jumper to bring the score to 67-66, Colorado, with about four minutes left on the clock. K-State, however, couldn't connect, only scoring one basket in the next couple of minutes.

K-State goes on the road again on Wednesday, when they travel to Waco, Texas, to take on Baylor.

Three freshmen — Lehning, Marlies Gipson and JoAnn Hamlin — scored in double figures, as well.

This K-State team is learning how to win in the Big 12, and it couldn't come at a better time.

The Wildcats have won four of their last five, and a home matchup with second-place Missouri awaits on Wednesday.

Win that one and it will be clear — the rest of the league should be scared of these Wildcats.

votes last spring, Burns said the money is still sitting in the reserve account.

Burns said several possibilities for the money include a parking garage, renovations to the Rec Complex or Hale, projects with campus child care, endowment scholarships and a sprinkler system in the Union.

"The Center for Student Activities could come up again, but my guess is it would not," Burns said.

Application guidelines state that any student, faculty or staff member, student organization or university department at K-State can submit a proposal.

"It's really pretty wide open as to who can apply for it," Student Body Vice President Grant Groene said. "The main stipulation is that it benefits the entire student body here on campus."

After proposals are submitted Sunday, the committee will meet to select proposals it thinks are valid or worthy. On Monday, the committee let applicants know if their proposal was selected for final review.

During the week of Feb. 20, those selected for final review will meet with the committee to present their proposals.

By March 1, the committee will make a public an-

"I imagine that some of it will come out, but it all depends on the quality of the application and proposals," Groene said.

Committee member Matt Wagner said proposals that benefit students could be matched with money. If none of the proposals encompasses a large population of the student body, the money will stay in the account, he said.

"Without proposals, this money will continue to grow and sit in this account and not be used to its purpose," Wagner said. "We would like to see this money put to use if there is a program that would benefit from it."

Josh Ballard, computing information/network security specialist for Computing and Network Services, said the first thing he does when notified of an e-mail scam is contact the hosting provider, who shuts down the host.

"More than likely, someone in the region who was familiar with K-State Credit Union gained access to a compromised computer from Korea and used it to host the Ballard also said there are many compromised computers in Asia.

Anyone with the know-how and software can access one of them over the Internet and host a Web site from there.

run for us."

Four Wildcats finished with double digits in scoring. Freshmen Gipson, Shalee Lehning and JoAnn Hamlin notched 12 points, 11 points and 11 points respectively, while Coggins had 21 points. Junior Twigg McIntyre added another nine.

"I think we just had great ball movement, and shots were falling," Gipson said.

Iowa State's Lindsey Medders entered the game as a key threat to the Wildcats. Medders is one of the top scorers in the Big 12 and averaged almost 17 points per game before entering the match with K-State.

Although the Cats were able to hold Medders to only 11 points in the first half, she exploded with 19 points in the second to finish with the game-high 30 points. Medders was only one of two Cyclones to score in double figures, the other being Brittany Wilkins with 19.

"It was definitely exciting

No filers for top SGA spot

By Abby Brownback
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

It is almost two weeks after the first presidential pairing announced their candidacy in last year's election, and no one is yet seeking Student Governing Association's top spot for the 2006-07 academic year.

In the 2005 election, Tyson Moore and Matt Wagner began their campaign for student body president and vice president on Jan. 19, 2005.

"We wanted everyone at K-State to know of our intentions as soon as was possible," Moore, senior in information systems, said.

However, candidates have until the Feb. 17 filing deadline to announce their candidacy. The fifth presidential ticket of Jeremy Parker and Dustin Schirer was filed after last year's filing deadline.

Elections Commissioner Tanner Banion said he does not think later campaign starts will affect the elections. He said he still expects three to five presidential pairs to announce their candidacy.

"I don't think it'll hurt the process if people announce a little later," Banion, junior in political science, said.

"They just may announce in rapid succession."

Moore said he and Wagner wanted to begin their campaign and begin addressing their platform issues immediately. He said their early announcement gave students adequate time to research campaign issues and ask questions of the candidates.

This year's primary elections are Feb. 28 and March 1, the general elections are March 7 and 8.

Multiple tax filing options exist

By Lola Shrimplin
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Paul Becker has done his own taxes for about six years.

Before that, Becker, junior in English, said he took his taxes to his father so he could get all of the deductions available.

"I've been pretty much broke my whole life," Becker said.

Becker got married in August and said he plans to take his taxes to a professional since the changes in filing practices are different.

Even before he got married, Becker said tax forms confused him.

"It was like, what is this act? What is this code?" he said.

Students filing their taxes this year have many options for deductions, said Richard Ott, associate professor and department head of accounting.

Winter blues

Cold weather, seasonal absence of sunlight can cause depression

By Lacey D. Mackey
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Some might call it the winter blues, but doctors have categorized the sense of depression that often can go hand-in-hand during the cold winter months as Seasonal Affective Disorder.

Terry Pfannenstiel, program director of outpatient services at Pawnee Mental Health Services, said research has shown that light treatment has a positive influence on peoples' attitudes.

"There certainly is research to support treatment with light helps demeanor," he said. "Whether the opposite is true, we can't quite make that leap."

Pfannenstiel said the sense of depression in winter is based on the changes of seasons and the lack of sun.

To minimize depression, Pfannenstiel said possible solutions include therapy, possible medications and getting natural light.

Because the winter months fall into the time of a large holiday season, Pfannenstiel said an increase of people coming for counseling is common during the winter months, but if for seasonal depression or not, he said it was hard to tell.

"There's a certain proportion of people we might see during the winter months," Pfannenstiel said. "Typically, during the holidays, we see a little more of that."

Sarah Wesch, post-doctoral fellow at University Counseling Services, said depression influenced by changes in the weather seems to occur in some cases.

"The farther north the latitude, the more seasonal mood pattern disorders seem to occur," she said.

Wesch said the symptoms of depression and SAD often are similar but might change depending on the case.

"For someone with seasonal pattern depression, they tend to sleep more and eat more," Wesch said. "For depression without seasonal patterns, it can go either

Seasonal Depression

- Seasonal feelings of depression outweigh nonseasonal episodes way."

For those experiencing SAD, Wesch said a lack of energy is common in addition to other symptoms, including sadness, thoughts of hopelessness and guilt.

Because of its association with the K-State student body, Wesch said Counseling Services found it difficult to point to the determinant of depression in some students who need counseling.

"It's hard for us to pull academic pattern from seasonal pattern," Wesch said.

While there is no formula for depression, Wesch said sunny days seemed to put people in a better mood.

"Anecdotally, we'll see a lot of cancellations on sunny days," Wesch said. "When it's 75 (degrees) out, people are out having fun. We also see people cancel on rainy or snowy days, because people don't want to get out."

Afton Massey, junior in elementary education, said she does not enjoy Kansas' cold winter weather.

"I don't look forward to the winter because it's cold, and it's usually very cloudy and gray outside," Massey said. "Gray is usually a depressing color."

While she has never experienced a sense of depression because of the weather, Massey said she can understand how warm and cold days can influence attitude.

"I think when the sun's out and the sky is blue, you're more apt to be happy than when it's 20 degrees outside and it's gray," she said.

When snow covers the sidewalks or the cold wind requires bundling up, Massey said she would rather spend the day in bed, dreaming of sunny days.

"There are times when I don't want to walk across campus, and I wish I didn't have to get out that day," she said. "There are times when I wish for summer days."

This season's warm winter days have been a nice change of pace, Massey said, but she's concerned a cold snap will bring winter back.

"This year has been an exception," she said. "One day it could be 60 (degrees) outside, and the next day it's snowing. I like that it's warmer, but I'm really afraid it's going to snow in April."

Use of TEVALS in tenure process varies

By Megan Green
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Students said they believe some professors don't take student evaluations into account when reviewing their performance in the classroom.

Tessa Foust, junior in management, said she doesn't think the TEVALS used by students to evaluate professors are considered.

"I had a professor where I had given bad TEVALS," Foust said, "and I know other people now taking their class, and I don't think I was the only person who didn't like the professor."

Probationary status professors, or professors still waiting for a tenure review, are required to give TEVALS to their students annually and for each course they teach. At the end of the semester when all grading has been done, the teachers receive the teacher evaluations back so they can look at them and improve their teaching from the comments of students.

"Sometimes those perspectives will change what I am going to do," said Vicky Clegg, director of the Center for the Advancement of Teaching and Learning.

However, when a professor has been teaching at K-State for five or six years and is being reviewed for tenure, student evaluations of that teacher may not be seen by anyone doing the reviewing.

The University Handbook states that promotional packets that are reviewed for professor tenure "ought to" include student evaluation report results. This means different departments can say whether student evaluations should be included in those packets or not.

Depending on the department, if TEVALS are mandatory in the review packet, they are compiled into a report, but student comments may not be included.

"I don't think they have much effect on anything," Justin Penrod, senior in pre-professional architectural engineering, said. "You don't notice much change year to year, especially with younger students. They'll have the same teachers and the same material. Nothing seems to change."

When a professor is being reviewed for tenure, it means his or her contract will be renewed and their position at K-State is secure.

If, in the process, he or she doesn't gain tenure, they will be let go from K-State.

"In essence, being tenured means your job continues as long as you do what you're supposed to do," Al Cochran, assistant provost, said. "You meet the requirements as established by department documents."

REVIEW PROCESS

Every professor is reviewed for tenure after five or six years of teaching at K-State under a probationary status.

Each professor goes through a process that differs from department to department (K-State has 64 departments), but in general follow all the same basic guidelines listed in the University Handbook.

"There isn't really a university guideline that has to be followed for each department," Clegg said. "Each department has very specific guidelines."

The professor puts together a "promotional packet" that details all the work he or she has done, the research, the teaching and the professor's professional accomplishments, and, in most cases, teacher evaluation reports from students.

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — Police are urging people not to jump to conclusions over the death of an Overland Park, Kan., man who died in police custody two hours after being shocked three times with a Taser. Alito hearing likely

WASHINGTON, D.C. — The Senate on Monday all but guaranteed Samuel Alito's confirmation as the nation's 110th Supreme Court justice, shutting down a last-minute attempt by liberals to block the conservative judge's nomination with a filibuster. Republican and Democratic senators, on a 72-25 vote, agreed to end their debate.

Enron trial

HOUSTON — A jury of Houston-area residents was selected Monday for the trial of former Enron Corp. chiefs Kenneth Lay and Jeffrey Skilling, accused of orchestrating the massive fraud that came to symbolize an era of corporate scandals. U.S. District Judge Sim Lake instructed the jury to not talk about the case during their service.

Headlines from the nation's universities

Iowa State police monitor Facebook

AMES, Iowa — The Facebook and similar Web sites, such as MySpace and LiveJournal, are public sources of information that can be accessed by anyone, but students seem to be unaware that university faculty, employers and police departments are looking at them as well.

According to The Chronicle of Higher Education, four students at Northern Kentucky University were caught sneaking a keg into their residence hall because they took a picture of themselves with the keg and posted it on Facebook.

"We don't actively monitor Facebook," Bethany Schuttinga, assistant dean of students, said. "It's not our intention and that's not a goal for our office to spend our time doing that."

She also said the university could technically use information posted to find students who cause problems.

"What they're choosing to post in a public forum is public information, and as an institution we can take disciplinary action," Schuttinga said.

The ISU police department has been known to use the site for investigations but does not use it as a concrete form of evidence.

"There have been online postings that have contributed to investigations," ISU police Capt. Gene Deisinger said. "By themselves they don't hold much evidential value. They're hearsay."

Samuel Braverman, junior in mechanical engineering, said he had heard rumors that Iowa State has people monitoring Facebook, but didn't think anyone beyond that would use the site.

"For example, if you put up a bunch of pictures of yourself where you've obviously been drinking heavily, most of your friends might find those pictures amusing, but what about future employers?" he said.

Illinois teens get tattooed

NORMAL, Ill. — Illinois rung in the New Year with 288 new state laws, one of which will affect Illinois teens.

On Jan. 1, the legal age to get a tattoo in Illinois was lowered from 21 to 18.

Steve Slinker, owner of Reigning Color Tattoo Studio in Normal, Ill., said he thinks the new law will increase business and bring in new customers.

"I presume we're going to start seeing more 18-year-olds. We've been here for 10 years and we've always checked ID's and still will," Slinker said.

While the law permits 18-year-olds to get a tattoo, anyone under 18 cannot, even with a parent or legal guardian's signature.

"The problem I foresee is that teens under 18 cannot get a tattoo. The other problem is a lot of tattoo shops might not follow the new law, especially if the teen has their parent's consent. We're not tattooing anyone under 18, but there are going to be other shops that will, ultimately giving all shops a bad name," Leon Battiste, manager of Artkore Tattoos in Normal, said.

Despite the new law, some tattoo shops in the Bloomington-Normal area will still continue to tattoo teens under 18 as long as their parent or legal guardian are with them.

Adventure clubs offer thrills, fun

Parachute, sailing, paintball clubs give members exercise while satisfying their need for excitement outdoors

By Christina Hansen
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

K-State students seeking thrills and excitement might find just what they are looking for by joining one of the campus' adventure-minded clubs or organizations.

There are more than 350 registered student organizations on campus, appealing to a variety of interests and academic majors. Several student groups, however, offer members the chance to escape from the daily grind of lectures and coursework.

Jason Lauer, graduate student in biochemistry, is the president of the campus-based Parachute Club. Lauer said the club gives members a thrill they will not soon forget.

"There is no greater feeling in life than the first time you jump from an airplane," he said.

Lauer is a skydiver licensed by the United States Parachute Association, and has been a member of the club for two and a half years. He has completed nearly 200 jumps and said he is pursuing a coaching license.

Despite several skydiving experiences in the past, Lauer said he never thought about pursuing certification until he joined the K-State Parachute Club.

"I am licensed today because the club is full of people who want to skydive," Lauer said. "They're not just out to take my money or make a profit."

The club's first jump class of the semester will take place March 3 and 4. Lauer said prices vary with the type of jump and amount of instruction, but fees are much lower than many other instructors charge since the club is non-profit.

Adventurers who prefer tying knots over pulling parachute chords might be interested in joining the K-State Sailing Club.

Peter Lundquist, club president and senior in agronomy, said sailing is an activity anyone can enjoy.

"It's a great way to meet people, learn about the sport, and just get out on the water and enjoy Tuttle Creek," he said.

No experience is necessary to join the club, Lundquist said.

He said novice sailors can improve their skills by assisting on one of the many boats owned and maintained by the club.

"We have everything from one-person boats called Lazars to 26-foot cabin boats," he said. "Which boat we use depends on how many people turn out for a trip."

The Sailing Club participates in local races, but more often members have beach barbecues and special sailing events.

Trapper Callender, sophomore in anthropology, said competition and skillful teamwork are two goals that motivate members of the Kansas State Paintball Club.

"We compete in national collegiate paintball tournaments all over the country," Callender said. "We took first place at the tournament we hosted here last semester."

Callender has been playing paintball for several years, but said club events are open to anyone interested in the sport and having lots of fun.

He said his only regret now is that he did not join the Paintball Club sooner.

"I've known most of the guys in it for a while, but I put off joining the club until last semester," Callender said. "I finally became a member, and now I'm the vice president."

Intersection topic of public meeting

By Logan C. Adams
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Fort Riley Boulevard might see a few stoplight changes.

There will be a meeting at 5:30 tonight in the Manhattan City Commission room at City Hall for the public to look at and comment on designs for the 11th Street project.

Amy Houlette, engineer for the Manhattan Department of Public Works, said she expects a strong turnout at the meeting. She said city staff will be on hand to answer questions and take comments on the concepts.

The project centers on changes to 10th and 11th streets where they intersect with Fort Riley Boulevard. The plan is to turn 11th Street into a link from Bluemont Avenue to Poyntz Avenue and Fort Riley Boulevard.

Juliette Avenue and 17th Street are the only roads that connect all three downtown thoroughfares.

The plan would effectively reverse the roles of 10th and 11th streets where they meet Fort Riley Boulevard.

Tenth Street has a stoplight where it intersects with Fort Riley Boulevard but connects with Poyntz and Bluemont Avenues with stop signs.

However, 11th Street has stoplights where it meets Bluemont and Poyntz avenues, but does not connect with Fort Riley Boulevard from the north at all. It attaches to the south end, but it stops at the railroad.

The plan also includes other additions to 11th Street, including adding turn lanes at the intersection with Poyntz Avenue.

Robert Ott, city engineer, said the city has to get the Kansas Department of Transportation to sign off on the project before construction starts because part of Fort Riley Boulevard includes Kansas Highway 18.

KDOT and previous studies have recommended the stoplight at 10th Street be removed if 11th Street is connected to Fort Riley Boulevard, Ott said. He said there is not enough traffic there to justify keeping both stoplights.

Ott said the plan would block off 10th Street on the north side of Fort Riley Boulevard, and add a raised median in the middle of the intersection to make the south part of 10th Street be right-in, right-out.

The Manhattan City Commission will not make a decision at the meeting. Commissioner Tom Phillips said he is not convinced either way on the project.

"I, for one, still need to be demonstrated that this project is necessary," Phillips said. "I still need to see what the costs and benefits to the city would be."

Mayor Pro Tem Bruce Sneed said he is still undecided on the project.

"I think there is logic to the rearrangements that have been discussed," Sneed said.

Ott said he hopes to hear opinions on the crosswalks along Fort Riley Boulevard.

"We just haven't seen an intersection that has a higher volume than the others," he said. "So we're interested in the public's perception."

TO THE POINT Filing taxes early benefits students' wallets

Filing taxes might seem like a drudgery, but for students, the refund check in the mail is a welcome sight at a time when paychecks are stretched thin and student loan money is running out.

Students usually get all or most of their money back, and several credits are available if students qualify. Filling out the forms is a small but necessary task to ensure no money is owed.

Online filing sites and programs have made do-it-yourself taxes simple. Filing early means an early refund check and direct depositing can speed the process up too.

The money can be used to pay rent, buy the last textbook or a plane ticket for spring break.

Any student receiving W-2 forms should file and file early. At a university, there are resources available to help students understand and complete their taxes.

If the forms are confusing, take them to an accountant or ask a friend in the accounting program for help. This campus has a wealth of information to assist you. Just get it done. Asking parents for help is a good place to start.

The few hours filing now takes will be worth the few hours on the beach or the slopes during break that the early refund money made possible.

To the point is an editorial selected and debated by the editorial board and written after a majority opinion is formed. This is the Collegian's official opinion.

Dance! Dance?

Interactive game helps battle obesity

I have a ton of respect for those Dance Dance Revolution kids.

In their short lives, they have mastered a skill that would take me years of practice stop sucking. But, through some cruel twist of fate, these skilled performance artists are often a mocked and under-appreciated segment of society.

I know what goes through the average student's head when passing a DDR machine in an arcade or bowling alley: "What's so hard about that?"

All you have to do is jump when the machine says jump and put your feet on the appropriate areas. I could master that thing in five seconds."

Wrong. Dance Dance Revolution requires above-average speed, agility, stamina and reaction time.

That's why I've never tried it.

Many people have started to see DDR, which was released by Konami in 1998, for what it truly is — a fun way to exercise. In fact, the game is so popular in Norway that it was made an official sport.

Americans are catching DDR fever, too.

According to a Jan. 26 Associated Press report, West Virginia, which consistently ranks as one of the country's most obese states, has decided to put DDR machines in all 157 of the state's middle schools.

State officials say the inclusion of the video game-workout hybrid is not meant to replace traditional physical education classes; rather, it aims to supplement them by providing an exercise opportunity for children who aren't interested in traditional sports.

I can't remember the last time I said this, but, way to go West Virginia. Childhood obesity — and obesity in general — is becoming a huge problem, and if there exists in this world a magical machine that makes more children want to exercise more often, then it should be as prevalent as humanity possible.

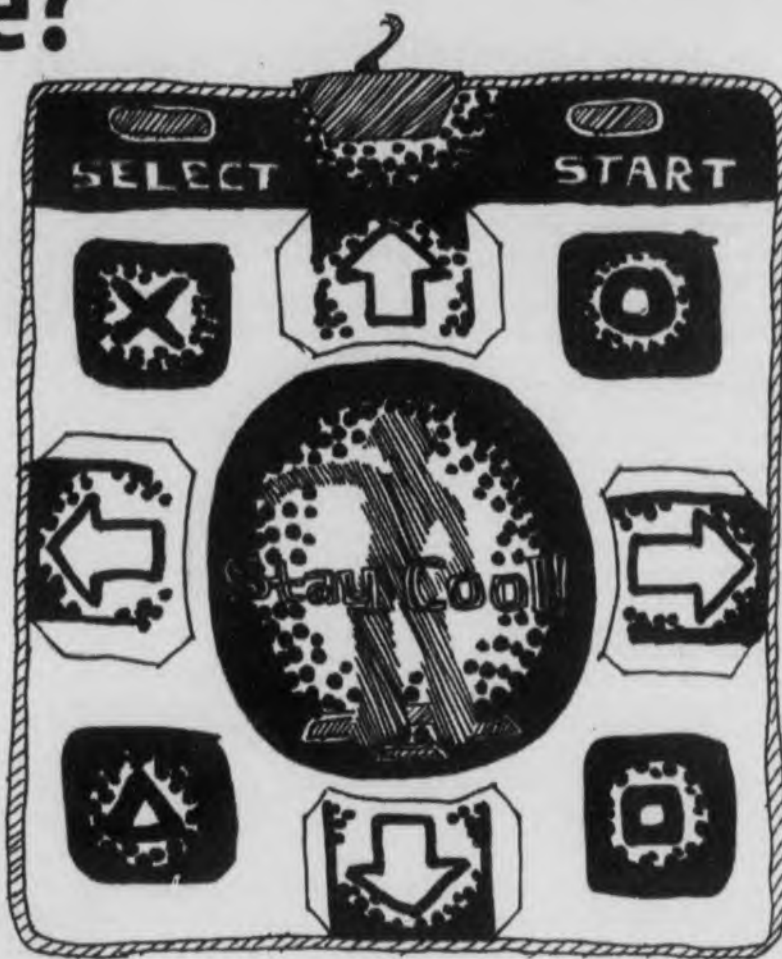

In addition to potentially luring children into a healthier, more active lifestyle, the presence of DDR machines in gym classes could have another great effect on middle school life: it has the power to turn the traditional gym class pecking order on its head.

Imagine a typical Monday afternoon in a West Virginia middle school.

During gym class, the students compete in a friendly game of kickball, wherein one of the bigger, stronger, more physically mature kids kicks the ball so hard it bounces off the wall on the other side of the gym. In true caveman fashion, this alpha boy is cheered for and regarded as the champion of the group.

Now, imagine a typical Tuesday in that same middle school class.

Instead of kickball, today's activity is a friendly Dance Dance Revolution tournament. This time, instead of watching alpha boy once again establish his dominance, a smaller, scrawnier student whose reflexes and cat-like speed have been honed by afternoons spent playing video games wipes the floor with the rest of the class. Maybe this student even makes alpha boy cry a little.

Without things like consistent physical dominance to determine who's cool, middle schoolers might be forced to find more substantial measures by which to judge their peers. That could make life better for tons of kids. And, by providing opportunities for success to children of different abilities, while at the same time introducing new, fun types of exercise, all students will be benefited.

In that sense, Dance Dance Revolution actually has the potential to start — ahem — a revolution. And someday, Americans might call it a sport, too.

If ESPN can air poker tournaments and trick billiards contests, why not a little friendly DDR?

Truck stops, politicians could live in harmony

I'm going to put in a truck stop.

Not in some far-flung corner of town, or down by the interstate — but right at 1530 Barrington Dr., smack dab in the middle of a subdivision with a name like Muddy Brook or Funky Creek or some such.

Put in some 24-hour gas pumps, one of those drive-through car washes for 18-wheelers and maybe get some loose women to loaf around.

I figure if the city commission finds no qualms with booting folks out of their homes for the redevelopment, we shouldn't think too much about running them out of their humble abodes, either.

JONAS
HOGG

That's why I want to put in a truck stop — right in front of city commissioner Tom Phillips' beautiful plantation-style home.

See, Barrington Drive is zoned as a residential area, so the good city of Manhattan only gets one shot a year to collect money from those nice folks through property tax.

Throw up a truck stop, next thing you know McDonald's will move in, then one of those souvenir stores. In comes business, in comes sales tax — Barrington Drive becomes a revenue-generating corridor for our great city.

Everybody wins — except Tom. But Tom should realize that sometimes you have to make sacrifices for the betterment of the community.

Just ask the tenants of 318 Fremont St., soon to be forced out of their homes of several years by the city to make way for downtown redevelopment.

Don't worry, Tom; I won't actually tear down that beautiful house of yours. I'll make the downstairs a gas station, and that lovely balcony on the second floor seems like a great place to set up a restaurant.

Truckers love a good brunch, you know.

I shan't discriminate against the other commission members, though. I know they'd want to help further their community as well.

While I'm at it, I might go ahead and grab that mansion on the hill next-door.

The Morris-Hardeman household is a puzzler.

Fortunately, I think a liquor store would fit in just right.

With so many college kids nearby, it would be an almost guaranteed money-maker, and what would spice up dull old Laramie Street better than some neon signs and halogen lights?

I'd even give it some catchy name like "Hogg's Watering Hole," to lend it a bit of ambience. I wouldn't want the neighbors thinking the place had gone downhill or anything.

For a while I pondered grabbing hold of the mayor's house off Gary Avenue, but I can't do anything with that until he takes his Christmas lights down (Come on, Ed. It's been a month).

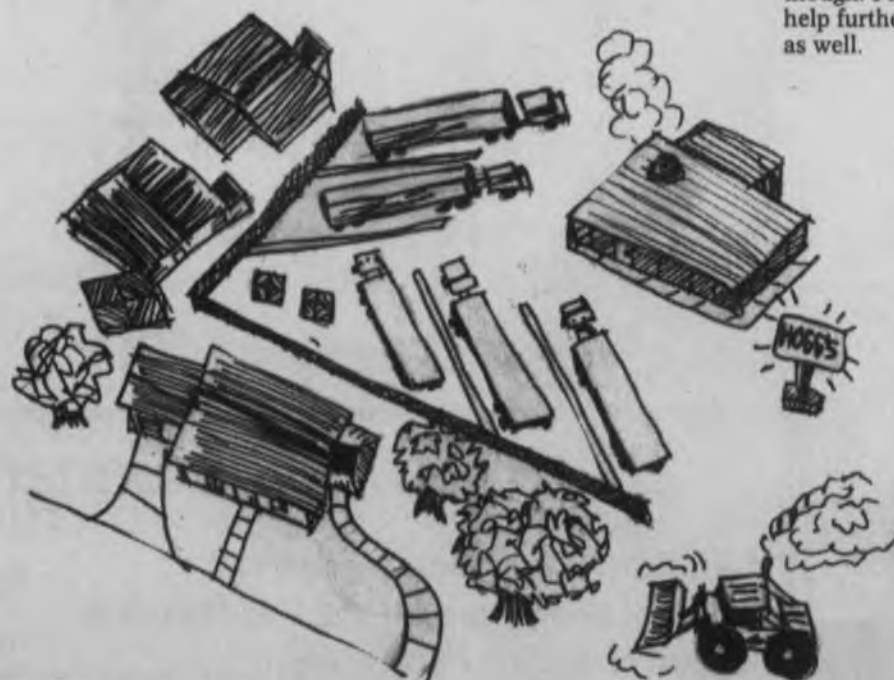

See, I reckon that since you kind council members are all about sacrifice for the betterment of the city, you'd want to set a proper example for the good people to follow before you up and toss them out on their duffs.

Of course, you might want to say that if you own something and I take it away from you against your will, then that's just plain old thieving. I'd say you'd be dead on.

But, what do you think this eminent domain thing really is? Who do you jokers think you're helping?

Certainly not the people at 318 Fremont.

New criteria for Graduation Scholastic honors are fair

Editor,

As a faculty member known as a 'Students' Professor' during more than three decades at K-State, I read with great delight in the Jan. 18 paper that the Faculty Senate has approved new criteria for Graduation Scholastic Honors, which are in fairness and consistently based on the student's grade point average.

A GPA-based system had been used several decades earlier and had been abolished and replaced by a scheme generally based on class percentages, which resulted in concomitant GPA requirements changing from one year to the next.

I have received more than an earful of complaints from students who did not graduate with scholastic honors in a given year but would have done so by GPA cutoffs the year before. Of course, my sympathetic ear did not remedy the matter.

I have attempted on several occasions to point out the unfairness of the situation, but my suggestions for corrective action were ignored by the Faculty Senate. I feel emphatically that the new criteria are a giant step in the right direction toward an equitable solution. Hur-ray!

Wooldridge deserves credit for rebuilding program

Editor,

I have followed K-State men's basketball since I was in grade school and have attended home games and followed the program every year to date. I feel great about where our program is right now, but there are those who would criticize Coach Jim Wooldridge and say six years is way too long to develop his team. I would like to discuss some things in defense of Wooldridge.

Let me say that my family and I were ecstatic in 2000 when we found out Tom Asbury was being replaced. By the end of his time here, he was a foul-mouthed coach who didn't care about the team.

So, however much Bill Snyder had to build our football program in the late '80s, Wooldridge had to completely rebuild the basketball program: If Snyder had to start from scratch, Wooldridge started with a handicap and had to work his way up to scratch. He inherited Asbury players who were ill-trained and in their final years. To make matters worse, there was a new Big 12 rule in place the year Wooldridge started that prevented him from signing more than five players in a single year and no more than eight in two years. Thankfully, this was finally removed in 2004.

In conference play, we have lost some games we should have won, but this is not bad coaching. We have never been the most physical team. We do not have a team of brutes and brawlers who go out and hack the heck out of their opponents. I appreciate Wooldridge teaching his team proper basketball skills.

Lastly, I know Wooldridge hasn't always felt the warmth at home that he should have: He and his teams also have lacked the support of an adequate fan base. I appreciate those who have been loyal and not fair-weather fans, and I know Wooldridge feels the same way. On a side note, the reason we didn't get into post-season play last year was because Athletic Director Tim Weiser was successful in preventing us from getting into the NIT. This was because he wanted to fire Wooldridge. Please support Wooldridge and his team for the rest of this season!

I want to close by saying that, win or lose, I will always cheer for our basketball team. I hope the rest of you K-Staters can say the same thing. Wooldridge is doing a great job with his team, and this year it's going to pay off.

Attendance policy generous, allows students absences

Editor,

I was taken aback at the vehement reaction to the Department of Modern Languages's decision to adhere to the Spanish section's regular attendance policy on the occasion of President Bush's visit. In short, our policy is generous and flexible enough to accommodate even the most important campus events.

All of our lower-level classes have a number of "free" absences that can be used for any purpose. In Spanish I-III, for example, a student may take five absences without explanation or penalty.

Beyond five absences, the student is obliged to provide documentation if he or she must be absent. It seems to me the only reason for saving free absences would be to use them for something considered more worthy than a presidential visit.

This policy is in place to allow our students the choice to attend such events as a Landon Lecture or one of the other myriad events that take place at this university. It is disingenuous to argue that we did not give excused absences for the Bush speech. Departments with more restrictive policies would need to make an exception for the President's visit.

This department actively encourages all students to make the most of the university experience.

Because of our generous attendance policy, I believe our department leads the pack in promoting student involvement in Landon Lectures and other formative campus activities.

Furthermore, all of our instructors stand ready to provide help for those who would like assistance with the material covered in Jan. 18 classes.

Bush's disregard for laws might collapse Constitution

Editor,

President Bush's visit to K-State is a piece of history revisited. Thirty-six years ago, then-President Richard Nixon visited our university. Like Nixon, K-State was the only university (excluding the military academies) that Bush dared visit. Like Nixon, Bush swore to faithfully uphold the laws on inauguration day, and then proceeded to ignore any laws he found inconvenient.

By law, each year the Pentagon must submit to Congress a report explaining how the money was spent, but in no year since the inauguration has the required report been forthcoming.

Like Nixon, Bush has flaunted the law requiring warrants from a court for surveillance (Bush first claimed that seeking warrants would delay prompt action). Then, when he was told that the FISA laws allowed him to proceed with wiretaps for three days before getting a warrant, he offered a second lame argument: seeking a warrant within 72 hours involved excessive paperwork, and the need to "marshal arguments." Apparently, marshalling arguments is not their strong suit.

Bush got his legal counsel (at that time Alberto Gonzales) to inform the Senate that in their opinion "the President does not have to obey a law that he thinks is unconstitutional." Of course, such a theory would make the mental state of the President a deciding principle in the way our government operates. Nixon also shared the view that the President is beyond the law: "when the President does it, it is legal," he said.

The possible collapse of our constitutional form of government frightens me more than all the stumbling disasters in foreign policy, in our national debt, in our environment and our resources, and his relentless war on the middle class (decreasing real income, health issues, FEMA, etc). To me, losing the form of government our forefathers created is far worse.

It is just a shame that merely writing this letter might expose my family to Soviet-style wiretapping, unsupervised by an independent judiciary.

Students need to learn facts on theory of evolution

Editor,

Before everyone starts believing the nonsense in Gary Harbaugh's letter "Young minds need to learn evolution, intelligent design," I would like to set the record straight.

According to dictionary.com, the first definition of "theory" is "A set of statements or principles devised to explain a group of facts or phenomena, ESPECIALLY ONE THAT HAS BEEN REPEATEDLY TESTED" (emphasis added).

This definition applies to the "theory" of evolution. It is a scientific hypothesis that has been tested and retested for more than a century, without any significant evidence to prove it false.

As a result, scientists worldwide accept this theory. But in Kansas we seem to think we know better than those scientists who have dedicated their lives to researching this subject.

Now look at dictionary.com's fourth "theory" definition: "Abstract reasoning; speculation."

This is how the "theory" of intelligent design came about. Some genius was sitting at his desk thinking through what-if scenarios in his head.

After a couple of hours of scenarios like, "What if can-openers had never been invented?" he became bored and turned to the scenario, "What if some invisible, giant ghost with a brain created the universe, including humans?"

Now, he cannot be blamed for coming up with the idea, but the person who thought it should be taught in a high school science class, that's another story.

Harbaugh called both theories "plausible," and maybe if you squint that is true.

Personally, I would rather spend my time learning about a theory based on facts, not speculation.

10 ideas for Favre's idle time

Future Hall of Famer and Green Bay Packer quarterback Brett Favre isn't sure what to do if he retires.

In an interview that aired on ESPN on Sunday, Favre said if he had to decide right now he would hang up his cleats, but was worried about what he would do as a retiree.

MATTHEW GIRARD

Favre has been one my absolute favorite players to watch and I have nothing but respect for the guy, but the three-time National Football League Most Valuable player should run with his decision to retire.

The Packers are rebuilding, and it looks like that process is going to take a while. Although Favre is still physically able to keep playing for the next four or five years, he shouldn't have to wait around for the team to retool.

But I'm not here to just tell Brett to retire, I'm going to help the 16-year veteran transition into the life of a retired football player, David Letterman-style, with my "Top 10 ways Favre can occupy his time as a retired NFL quarterback."

10. Become a male-model: Since you have been in the league, the ladies have oogled you. All you would have to do is stand there and look good and get paid for it.

9. Become a recruiter for Flava Flav's reality show "The Flavor of Love." I'm not sure Flav has standards, but it could give you a few laughs.

8. Create a Web site with random facts about cheese: You have lived in the "Cheese State" for so long, I'm sure you could teach a course on the milk product.

7. Make an appearance on Sesame Street as a sponsor of the No. 4.

6. Give a Landon Lecture. The topic could be "Working with crappy players who drive your Hall-of-Fame career into the ground."

5. Write a book.

4. Become a broadcaster. Why not? You still get to watch football and you don't get chased and tackled by 400-pound gorillas.

3. Keep former K-State coach Bill Snyder company.

2. Take a tour around the country to educate the masses about the correct pronunciation and spelling of your name. Trust me, there are still people out there who don't get it.

And the No. 1 way Brett Favre can occupy his time as a retired NFL quarterback is ... to star in a sequel to "There's Something About Mary." You were much better than Ben Stiller in the first one anyway.

Intramural basketball grows in popularity

By Wendy Haun
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

This week was the beginning of the most popular winter intramural: basketball.

John Wondra, assistant director of Recreational Services, said the number of teams signed up is slightly more this year. This year, there are 330 basketball teams signed up in six categories.

"The last couple of years, we've seen an increase in the number of teams playing basketball," he said. "There were 302 teams who signed up to play last year."

This year, there are 23 fraternity teams, 19 residence hall teams, 120 independent men teams, 57 independent women teams, 39 6-foot and under teams and 73 co-rec (both sexes) teams.

Wondra said the popularity of the sport comes from a few factors.

"It seems to be a game that everyone's been exposed to," he said. "Most of the time, you find that people have played it in high school."

Phylcia Schultejeans, freshman in pre-professional business administration and member of the Shockers women's independent team, said she liked playing intramural for a variety of reasons.

"It's a good way to stay in shape," she said. "It's also a good way to get involved in the college and have fun."

Schultejeans said her team formed by girls who were all from the same area of Kansas and all played basketball in high school. She said playing was difficult, but it was still a good time.

"I'm a little out of shape," she said. "But I plan to play basketball again."

Jake Holloway, senior in finance and member of the Smokes men's independent team, said he plays several different intramural sports.

Holloway first started playing for his fraternity, Lambda Chi Alpha, his freshman year, but branched out his sophomore year on an independent team. Holloway said he likes the controlled atmosphere of intramurals.

"I like that it's organized basketball and not just pick-up games," he said.

Scott Kramer, freshman in kinesiology and member of the Roosters men's independent team, said there are a few reasons why he plays intramurals.

"It's fun to get out and play," he said.

BKW | Gipson named Rookie of the Week

K-State's Marlies Gipson was named Big 12 Conference Rookie of the Week Monday.

The 6-foot freshman forward from McPherson, Kan., recorded her first career double-double with 12 points and a league season-best 11 rebounds in a nine-point victory against Iowa State (73-64) on Jan. 29, helping the Wildcats to their third-ever win at Hilton Coliseum since the league's inception in 1996-97.

She also led K-State to its first 2-0 week in league play with a team-high 16 points in a 69-53 win over in-state rival Kansas on Jan. 25. Gipson scored 10-of-16 points in the first half alone against the Jayhawks, marking a career best point total in a single half.

For the week, she averaged 14.0 points, 8.0 rebounds, 3.0 assists, 0.5 blocks and 3.5 steals against the Jayhawks and Cyclones combined. Gipson also shot a team-leading 54.2 percent (13-24) from the floor and flawless from the charity stripe (2-2). She is the team's leading rebounder averaging 6.4 boards per game and holds the K-State freshman single-season record for blocked shots with a team-leading 39 rejections.

NFL | Favre leaning toward retirement

Brett Favre would like to wait until training camp to decide whether to retire or return to the Green Bay Packers for a 16th season.

But the quarterback realizes this amount of time is likely not a luxury he will be afforded.

In the interview at his home in Mississippi, Favre told Mortensen he would like more time to decide whether to return for another NFL season. But he understands the Packers need to know soon to properly prepare for the NFL draft and other offseason personnel matters.

NBA | Injury keeps Davis from returning to Knicks

Antonio Davis served a five-game suspension for rushing into the stands in defense of his wife, but his return to the court will have to wait.

Davis' wife, Kendra, exchanged words with a Bulls' fan during a Jan. 18 game in Chicago. After another fan became involved, Davis jumped over the scorer's table and ran into the stands during a timeout in overtime. He was ejected by the officials and suspended by the league the next day.

No matter the circumstances, the NBA made it clear there will be no leniency for players going into the stands, especially after last season's brawl at Detroit during a Pistons-Pacers game.

Ante up: Gambling still synonymous with Super Bowl Sunday

By Angie Hanson
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Dig into those pockets, folks, because the Super Bowl is here, and there are bets to be made.

The Super Bowl is undoubtedly the most popular sports betting day of the year. Whether it's in Las Vegas, the office, Internet or the comfort of your own living room, the betting industry quadruples for the event, said Matthew Ross, a spokesperson for BetUs.com Sportsbook, a sports-betting Web site based in San Jose, Costa Rica, that's been in operation for 12 years.

"It's clearly the biggest sports betting day out there, bar none," Ross said. "I don't have an exact figure, but I know the industry, as a whole, is in billions for the Super Bowl."

According to an article in the Jan. 22 edition of the Detroit News, an estimated 60 million people will bet $6 billion dollars on Super Bowl XL.

Gamblers alike began betting on the Super Bowl several months ago, before the season started, with gamblers already predicting what teams would make it to the game. Betting intensified when the Pittsburgh Steelers and the Seattle Seahawks won their respective conference championships.

With five days to go, online sportsbooks, like BetUs.com, are advertising up to 60 different betting options, Ross said.

"One of the options this year is, 'Which song is the Rolling Stones opening with this year?'" Ross said.

Favorites among betters, however, include the single-point spread - which is four points for the Steelers - and who is going to win the coin toss, Ross said.

The betting interest has increased with the availability and popularity of online gambling sites. The number of gambling Web sites has surged from 30 in 1996 to about 1,800, the Detroit News said.

The widespread gambling pastime also has brought with it more attention from the government and law enforcement officials. Each state has different gambling regulations. Many allow state lotteries, horse/dog racing, charitable gaming, gambling on Indian reservations and riverboat casinos. Internet gambling, on the other hand, is not as legal.

However, Web sites, like BetUs.com, avoid the issue by applying for their gaming licenses off shores. BetUs.com is licensed in San Jose, Costa Rica, and Kahnawake, Quebec, Canada - a Mohawk Indian reservation - where all types of gambling are legal.

"They have gaming jurisdictions, and we're fully licensed, so there's nothing anyone can do," Ross said.

Despite the legal restraints, sports betting is prevalent throughout the United States, including Manhattan, Kan, in less than legal conditions. According to Kansas statute 21-4406, sports bribery is illegal and, by definition, is considered, "conferring, or offering or agreeing to confer, any benefit upon a sports participant with intent to influence such participant not to give such participant's best efforts in a sports contest."

Lt. Hank Nelson of the Riley County Police Department said sports gambling is not a big problem in the area. Gambling itself is a hard thing to detect unless Nelson and the RCPD are informed by an inside source, he said.

"We don't see a lot of gambling - there hasn't been an arrest in the last six to nine months," Nelson said. "If somebody draws our attention to gambling, though, we're going to take a hard look."

Contrary to Nelson's belief, sports gambling is actually quite common in the area. Julian Ramirez, senior in sociology, used to bet through a local bookie but quit because his betting started getting out of hand, he said.

"It got a little out of control," Ramirez said. "When you're winning, it's really fun, but when you're not, it's not good."

Ramirez said it would come as a shock to many to find out who the bookies are in Manhattan. There are still five days until the game, and he said he might consider going back to a bookie for the Super Bowl.

"You would be very surprised who bookies are," Ramirez said. "Right now, I'm just betting straight up (for the Super Bowl), but I might change my mind and bet with a bookie."

Australian cell phone company launches campaign to increase drunk-dialing awareness

By Eileen Laux
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Pressing the send button on the cell phone can be trouble, especially if there is alcohol involved.

Drunk dialing is something that can be a regret for college students as they wake the next morning and realize they called their ex and professed their love.

Many companies are taking advantage of this concept and allowing students to take the approach that they don't want to drink and dial.

Virgin Mobile launched the "Don't Dial Under the Influence" campaign in Australia last December, but it has yet to reach to United States. The campaign uses slogans like, "95 percent of people dial under the influence. Virgin Mobile Australia helps you save face this Christmas."

The features allow customers to dial 333 plus the phone number to block that number so they can't dial it later while under the influence. It will stop all calls to that number until 6 the following morning.

Anne Green, senior vice president of CooperKatz, the public relations agency for Virgin Mobile, said the U.S. branch is thinking about launching the program but not right away.

"People are really getting a kick out of the campaign," she said. "Every Virgin Mobile is operated differently and each builds different content based on the systems available."

She said Australia is a smaller market, but the campaign has been moderately popular.

Tim McGlachlin, junior in statistics, said he drunk dials his friends and roommates.

"I think drunk dialing is kind of necessary," he said. "The truth has to come out sometime, and usually when drinking is involved, it will."

If Virgin Mobile did come out with the campaign in the U.S., McGlachlin said he really wouldn't notice.

"It all depends on what was said in the drunken conversation," he said. "If you don't remember the next morning, that can be a problem."

Zogo.com can be useful in drunk dialing, but is the opposite of Virgin Mobile's campaign.

Zogo can help students meet people while they are having fun or could be intoxicated.

Zogo is a dating company that allows people to connect using their cell phone. A person can sign up for free, then browse for people in their area, invite people they might want to text message and chat with those they choose over the phone.

Zogo CEO Jonathan Ressler said people can choose to accept invitations or not. If not, the person can be blocked and all contact will stop.

"It is a safe way to have fun and talk to people," he said. "This program basically takes online dating to a whole new level."

He said the projected audience is 18- to 34-year-olds, and since the launch in October, predominantly in New York, there have been several million hits on the Web site.

"Prowling" is a feature Ressler said has become popular. This allows people to recognize when others are wanting to talk or if they are out in their area and wanting to meet someone.

"I would say our company is ideal for college students," he said. "You don't need the Internet to use Zogo, and that helps because more people use their cell phones instead of a computer."

Artist injects experience with depression into album

"Tanglewood Numbers"

Album review by Mark Sibilla

Mental illness is debilitating. I can relate from personal experience that the mental anguish associated with depression is worse than any physical pain I have endured in my life.

However, mental illness is a catalyst for great art; unfortunately, most artists such as Kurt Cobain, Ian Curtis, Nick Drake and Elliott Smith choose to end their lives while in the midst of their creative apogee.

David Berman, the creative force behind the Silver Jews, was almost added to the list of great artists who died before their time.

Over the past few years, Berman dealt with substance abuse, depression and a suicide attempt. "Tanglewood Numbers" is the first album issued by Berman and The Silver Jews since his bout with depression.

Musically, the album has a different sound than what most fans of The Silver Jews have come to expect.

"Tanglewood Numbers" retains The Jews' fascination with rock, country and bluegrass, but the record sounds more polished.

Don't fret: The Silver Jews still sound like the best and rowdiest bar-band in the world; they've just added a spit shine to their sound.

Lyrical, Berman has not changed much, which is a good thing. He still retains his wry witticisms and clever storytelling, but he has added a darker undertone to his language.

Opener, "Punks in the Beerlight," shows listeners that the album is a full-band effort.

The album also features Berman's wife Cassie in a majority of the songs.

While her voice is not amazing, its softness is a nice foil to Berman's gruff vocals.

During the song's mid-section, Cassie sings, "If it ever gets really, really bad," before David counters with the insight, "Let's not kid ourselves. It gets really, really bad." It is one of the first direct mentions of Berman's illness.

"I'm Getting Back Into Getting Back Into You" is the album's mid-point highlight — a song that shows Berman realizing all the joy he missed through his dark journey.

That song is book-ended by two raucous, banjo-driven tracks: "Animal Shapes" and "How Can I Love You If You Won't Lie Down?" The former is a duet between Berman and his wife about the simple beauty of clouds that God has carved into animal shapes, while the latter is a jaunty, foot-stomping country tune.

"Tanglewood Numbers" climaxes with the final tune, "There Is a Place." It begins quietly as Berman simply states, "There is a place past the blues I never want to see again."

It is perhaps the most direct statement of his depression on the entire album. But the song does not linger in darkness for long.

The tempo and dynamics quickly swell as the band rushes toward the album's end with instruments squealing and Berman shouting: "I saw God's shadow on this world." It is an excellent moment of catharsis.

"Tanglewood Numbers" does contain some dark moments, but the purpose of the album is not to dwell on the pains of the past, but how one man can use that suffering to better his future.

The world almost lost another great musical artist, but something led Berman to the light at the end of his tunnel, and with "Tanglewood Numbers," he now can share that light with the rest of the world.

Regular exercise, coffee keep students energized

By Lacey D. Mackey
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

To keep up with a demanding schedule, students can find an extra boost from a habitual exercise routine, highly-caffeinated beverages and healthy eating.

Jeff Gragson, senior in sociology, started drinking coffee in high school and said he and his friends were regulars at the local Starbucks.

"I would just have a cup in the morning to keep me going," Gragson said.

After a few years in college and several finals weeks, Gragson said he keeps his coffee intake to about two cups a day.

Gragson said he likes his coffee dark and bold, and a cup will keep him going for about two to three hours.

During one finals week his sophomore year, Gragson said he pulled an all-nighter, consuming a pot and a half of coffee, consisting of about 12 to 16 cups.

But too much can have its side effects, Gragson said.

"Coffee is great, but you can get what I like to call, a coffee hangover," he said. "The next day you may have a headache or stomachache."

The key, Gragson said, is moderation.

Bianca Cavello, fitness director at Manhattan's Maximum Performance, 426 McCall Road, said exercise can give a necessary boost of energy when coupled with the right diet.

"Exercise can be an energy-booster if you're eating foods with the right nutrients," Cavello said.

Cavello said a good workout to start with would include cycling or a light cardiovascular workout but looking at all parts of health in one's lifestyle is vital.

"It's important to include each component to get the benefits," Cavello said. "You can't work at just one area."

One misconception, Cavello said, is the need to follow an extreme diet while practicing a heavy exercise routine.

Keeping in shape can be easier and long-lasting, Cavello said, if one cuts down on junk food and portion sizes.

"If you want more energy and exercise more, then you need more nutrients," she said. "You don't want to deprive your body. A lot of people think they need something quick and go on extreme diets."

When starting a new exercise program, Cavello said she suggests starting with light walking and light weights for about 20 to 30 minutes about three times a week.

"Don't just start with a tough cardiovascular workout," she said. "A lot of people come to the gym for an hour and a half every day and get burned out."

Cavello also said she suggests spreading out calories during the day to keep up the energy and keep off the pounds.

"Eat more frequently throughout the day, and it will give you more energy and boost your metabolism," Cavello said.

As a cup of Starbucks' French Roast coffee sits nearby, Christy Rose, sophomore in open option, studies biology at a table in Union Station on Monday afternoon. Some students look for an energy boost for their day from exercise routines, caffeinated beverages and healthy eating.

Mike Luckett, junior in pre-psychology, said to keep up with a tiring schedule, he used to drink Red Bull Energy Drinks until one of his fraternity brothers introduced him to a new source of energy, Burn Energy Drink. "At first, it's like a placebo effect, but it tastes better than those other energy drinks, and it has more caffeine," Luckett said. "It has a citrus flavor. It doesn't have that medicinal taste Red Bull has. It tastes more like soda."

Luckett said drinking a can of Burn helps keep him going when he needs a boost of energy when he hangs out with friends or needs to get some homework done.

While he uses Burn to energize, Luckett said his main source of energy comes from food.

"Food is my main source of energy, but if you want a kicker, Burn's there for you," he said.

University premier scholarships available to incoming freshmen

By Michlynn Rose
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Nearly one-third of incoming freshman earn scholarships, both premier and departmental, and about 85 percent of those students keep grades high enough to renew the scholarships, said Larry Moeder, assistant vice president in the Department of Student Financial Assistance.

Recipients of K-State premier scholarships, which range from a $1,000 one-time award to full in-state tuition and fees for four years, had to send in the K-State admission and scholarship applications by Nov. 1 of their senior year in high school, Moeder said.

"The premier scholarships are awarded on a variety of things," Moeder said. "The scholarship committee looks at ACT and SAT scores, high school grade point average, high school class rank, along with leadership involvement in the individual's high school, church and community."

During the third week of December, the university awards the scholarships to worthy candidates, Moeder said.

Thirty-three percent of incoming freshman earn K-State scholarships, including premier and departmental awards, he said.

"To be eligible for a four-year renewable scholarship, a residential student from Kansas must have an ACT score of 29 or higher, be in the upper 15 percent of their high school graduating class and accumulate a grade point average of 3.6 or higher," Moeder said.

"While attending KSU, the recipient of a renewable scholarship must maintain a grade point average of 3.5 or better."

Moeder said an out-of-state student has to meet the same qualifications to receive a premier scholarship as an in-state student. The committee will also look to see if a parent has a degree from K-State.

"Eighty-five to 87 percent of college freshmen keep their grades high enough to continue to receive their renewable scholarships throughout their four years at KSU," Moeder said.

If students have received four-year renewable scholarships and their GPA drops below a 3.5, they will not receive the scholarship money until they earn a GPA of 3.5 or better.

"The College of Engineering awards departmental scholarships on the basis of ACT scores and grade point averages, not on need," said Richard Gallagher, associate dean of the College of Engineering. He said several hundred scholarships are extended to incoming freshmen traditionally totaling $300,000.

"As for sophomores, juniors and seniors, the college tries to provide scholarships to those students in engineering with a grade point average of 3.5 or better," Gallagher said. "The College of Engineering will extend $1 million or more in scholarships to deserving students."

The College of Human Ecology also looks at ACT scores and GPA along with the rank in class for the basis of departmental scholarships, said Karen Pence, assistant dean of the College of Human Ecology.

"Scholarships range from $500 to $2,000," Pence said. "One scholarship available is for full tuition and fees and has specialized criteria including the recipient is from Reno county. There are 150 different scholarship funds on hand and 300 to 350 students receive aid from the college of Human Ecology."

Monika Graber, senior in public health nutrition, is an out-of-state student and her father is a K-State graduate. She received a legacy scholarship her freshman year that paid for half of tuition each semester.

"As an out-of-state student, the legacy scholarship was not that much but has really helped in the long run, as I did not have to take out any loans until the end of my sophomore year," Graber said.

Fraternity searching for fundraiser location

By Holly Smith
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The Alpha Phi Alpha fraternity had a fundraising event Saturday at the Manhattan Sports Academy, 2305 Skyvue Lane, tentatively labeling it as the final event in the building.

Building owner Vern Henricks said he is looking at potential buyers for the building, and he told Alpha Phi Alpha members to start looking for an alternate venue for their events. Henricks said he bought the building three years ago and uses it for after-school sports activities and sports training facility.

Alpha Phi Alpha has used the building for two years, and generally charges $5 admittance to events for fundraising, said Patrick Agwu, secretary and fundraising chair of Alpha Phi Alpha. All events are alcohol-free.

"The money raised helps fund progress within the chapter and allows us to do other activities that benefit the community," said Agwu, graduate student in environmental design.

The money helps fund the Miss Black and Gold Pageant, the Martin Luther King Jr. candlelight vigil, and the Thurgood Marshall Scholarship, said Brandon Clark, Alpha Phi Alpha special programs coordinator.

Manhattan Sports Academy earned the nickname

"The Warehouse" after Alpha Phi Alpha began having its events there.

"People started affectionately calling it 'The Warehouse' because of the warehouse look and feel of the building," Clark said.

Since hearing the news of the potential sale, Alpha Phi Alpha has been scouting new locations for its fundraising events.

"We have been looking for a new establishment that allows events to run until after 2 a.m.," Agwu said. "This is going to be a difficult transition to make because everyone who attends our parties are used to them lasting until 3:30 to 4 in the morning."

Henricks said he has enjoyed letting the fraternity use the facility for fundraisers.

"I am always willing to support youth in our community for the purpose of beneficial activities," he said. "Helping the fraternity out is just one way I felt I could make a positive difference."

TAXES | Online filing helps get quicker refunds

The problem comes with deciding which credits the students are eligible to take, Ott said.

"If they've paid for the qualified education credits, they're eligible (for the credit)," Ott said.

If the student's parents paid the expenses, their parents will get the credit, TJ Atwood, assistant professor of accounting, said.

The Hope credit is available to students in their first two years of college and offers a $1,500 deduction.

Students must be pursuing an undergraduate degree or other recognized program and be enrolled in at least six credit hours for at least one semester during the school year.

The Lifetime Learning Credit is available for all years a student is taking classes. The student does not have to be pursuing a degree, and the credit is $2,000.

Filing online also has become popular and is increasingly easy, Ott said.

If students fill out a 1040EZ form online and use direct deposit, they will get their refund quicker, Atwood said.

The decision to file online or go to an accountant depends on the student, said Donald Shepek, certified public accountant, and owner of Donald L. Shepek Accounting, 1623 Poyntz Ave.

People with more involved forms, such as business owners and farmers, might access an accountant, Shepek said.

Atwood said filing taxes can be confusing, and students might believe they are eligible for deductions for which they are not eligible.

"If they're a dependent of their parents, they don't get the personal exemption," she said.

For students who are not dependent to their parents or others, the personal exemption is $3,200 for a single filer.

Students might think they do not need to file, but they should file a tax return if they receive a W-2 form, Atwood said.

"You need to establish the fact you don't owe any money," she said.

PROFESSORS | TEVALS used in tenure process

The tenure review starts at the college level, when eligible faculty review the candidate's promotional packet. The way the packet is reviewed is, again, different within each department, and follows the criteria, standards and guidelines the department has established.

These eligible faculty members make a recommendation to the department head through written comments. The department head then writes a recommendation to the dean of the college.

The packet, recommendations and all tenure documents are given to the advisory committee and the dean of the college.

"The advisory committee is elected in some cases," said Jane Rowlett, director of the office of Academic Services. "But each college has different procedures on how they are appointed."

The committee bases its recommendations on a comparison of the candidate's credentials with the criteria and standards of the candidate's department as well as their contract.

"Some people could be hired to be 80 percent research, 20 percent teaching," Clegg said. "That will mean different things for tenure would be considered."

After the advisory committee advises the dean, the dean submits a written recommendation to the Dean's Council.

The Dean's Council then meets to discuss the candidate and look over all their promotional packets, recommendations and the comments of the previous committees. When the committee votes on whether the candidate should be tenured, the dean from the candidate's college does not vote and neither does the provost.

From here, the entire file and candidate is reviewed by the provost, and if the provost agrees the candidate should be tenured, he or she sends his or her recommendation to the president. According to the University Handbook, the president has final authority for granting tenure.

If a probationary professor is denied tenure, he or she can appeal the decision to the provost. If the provost still agrees with the denial of tenure, the candidate can file a grievance with the General Grievance Council.

"(It's) sort of like an official hearing of facts," Cochran said. "A professor presents their case to the council."

DO STUDENTS' OPINIONS PLAY A PART IN THIS?

"TEVALS definitely play a part in all of them," Cochran said. "TEVALS are always important and taken very seriously."

Rowlett said she had never seen a packet without TEVALS, even though it is not mandatory for each department.

"A majority of the time, the TEVAL reports are in the promotional materials," Rowlett said. "I've seen people denied of tenure because of teaching effectiveness and part of that evaluation would be because of student evaluations. The provost looks at the entire packet and that packet will probably have TEVAL scores in it."

The University Handbook it states, "Student evaluations should never be the only source of information about classroom teaching."

Teachers can be reviewed in other ways besides TEVALS, for example, the department head can review their syllabus and their grading. They can also sit in on classes or look over the content of the course.

"There's a whole list of different things," Rowlett said.

WHAT CAN A STUDENT DO IF THEY DO NOT LIKE A PROFESSOR'S TEACHING?

Cochran said he suggests when writing comments on TEVALS to not get carried away with emotion.

"Write comments as clearly as possible so you don't weaken your case," he said. "Student opinion is very much valued."

If a student still hears about how bad their former teacher is, later on, they can express their opinions to the department.

"They can meet with the department head and then go to the dean and indicate what they think are problems," Rowlett said.

Another option, Cochran said, is to have open communication between the student and the teacher.

"If the student has beef with the teacher," he said. "Talk to the teacher, and if there are still problems, talk to the department head."

Some students have seen a difference when they comment on a teacher through teacher evaluations.

"I think they do read them," Caitlin Peterson, sophomore in secondary education, said. "I've had some teachers that have brought it up before and said, 'My TEVAL said this.' I feel it's important."

Bush announces new energy incentive in address

By Matthew Girard
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

President George W. Bush delivered his fifth State of the Union Address on Tuesday night.

President Bush opened his hour-long speech by honoring Martin Luther King Jr.'s widow, Coretta Scott King, who died at the age of 78 Monday.

"Today our nation lost a beloved, graceful, courageous woman who called America to its founding ideals and carried on a noble dream," he said. "Tonight we are comforted by the hope of a glad reunion with the husband who was taken so long ago, and we are grateful for the good life of Coretta Scott King."

Bush then touched on several common points made in recent speeches, including the war on terrorism, the war in Iraq and recent National Security Agency wire-tapping revelations.

He also addressed the U.S.'s dependence on foreign oil by offering a proposal to end the nation's addiction to oil.

"Tonight, I announce the Advanced Energy Initiative — a 22-percent increase in clean energy research at the Department of Energy, to push for breakthroughs in two vital areas," Bush said. "To change how we power our homes and offices, we will invest more in zero-emission, coal-fired plants, revolutionary solar and wind technologies, and clean, safe nuclear energy.

"We will increase our research in better batteries for hybrid and electric cars, and in pollution-free cars that run on hydrogen. We will also fund additional research in cutting-edge methods of producing ethanol, not just from corn but from wood chips, stalks, or switch grass."

Bush called for the creation of a commission to research plans for dealing with the "Baby-boom" retirement effects on Social Security, Medicare and Medicaid.

Democrats applauded when Bush mentioned his defeated proposal to alter social security last year.

The president also announced a plan for improving education by training 70,000 high school teachers to lead advanced placement courses in math and science.

"If we ensure that America's children succeed in life, they will ensure that America succeeds in the world," Bush said.

Dale Herspring, professor of political science, said the 2006 State of the Union address was one of Bush's better ones.

"I thought he was very

Jamaican bar and grill gaining a loyal following

Kenrick Waite has some nice-looking legs. In fact, he has about 20 of them, cooking on the grill.

Kenrick, a Jamaican immigrant, and his wife Cathy own the Little Grill, a Jamaican-style bar and grill tucked away near Tuttle Creek Dam and Reservoir.

The grill, 6625 Dyer Road, has been open for four years and is the latest in a string of businesses that have occupied the spot over the years.

The address has been home to a bait shop and later a bar. Though the name on the sign has changed, some of the customers have not.

Don Huse, Manhattan resident, said he started frequenting the establishment when the dam was being built in the 1950s.

Huse said the building has gone through a bit of change in the last 50 years.

"It used to be a bar that served a bit of food, and it's the opposite now," he said.

Seamus Stack, manager of the restaurant, said the history of the establishment provided a good starting point when the business started.

"It started out as a small base of regulars, but since word got out, our base of regulars has been growing,"

Alito sworn in as justice

Staff reports
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Samuel Alito was sworn in Tuesday as the country's 110th Supreme Court Justice after the Senate confirmed him with a 58-42 vote.

His confirmation was the closest vote since Justice Clarence Thomas was confirmed 52-48 in 1991, according to The Associated Press.

Alito was sworn in before President Bush's State of the Union address. Alito will be ceremonially sworn into office today.

Sen. Pat Roberts, R-Kan., was included among Alito's supporters.

In a statement released Tuesday, Roberts said he voted in favor of Alito because many Kansans appreciate Alito's common sense.

"One only needs to look at Judge Alito's résumé to see his extensive experience in both prosecuting and applying the law," Roberts said in his statement. "While some have lodged that his decisions are biased

MLK widow dies at 78

By Cedrique Flemming
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Coretta Scott King, widow of the Rev. Dr. Martin Luther King Jr., died Monday night at Santa Monica Hospital in Rosarito Beach, Mexico, 16 miles south of San Diego, Calif.

King, 78, supported her husband during the roughest days of the American civil rights movement, and after his assassination in Memphis, Tenn., on April 4, 1968, she kept his dream alive while also raising their four children.

The King family issued a statement saying how happy they were with the kindness people around the nation were showing in this time of mourning.

"We appreciate the prayers and condolences from people across the country," the statement said.

During her lifetime, King became a symbol of her husband's struggle for peace and brotherhood.

King was with her husband during his finest hours.

Corrections and clarifications

Tuesday's article, "Use of TEVALS in the tenure process varies," needs clarification. The article said student evaluations of teachers up for tenure may not be seen by anyone doing the reviewing. The article did not say that some colleges have their own tenuring process. If you see something that should be corrected, call news editor Matt Girard at (785) 532-6556 or e-mail collegian@pub.ksu.edu.

Political groups join together for debate

By Ashleigh Williams
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Forum Hall was filled with emotion Tuesday night as the College Republicans debated the Young Democrats. The two groups addressed the topics of educational funding, social security, welfare, immigration, gay marriage and foreign policy.

When discussing education, the topic of instituting a voucher program came up. The republicans were in favor of the program, saying the power should be with the people to decide what to do with their own education. They said they thought the decision should be with the parents and children. The democrats had different reasoning.

"Underprivileged students are three grade levels behind by age nine and are less likely to graduate college. Is a voucher program going to do anything to fix this problem?" said Laura Woods, senior in philosophy and political science.

Immigration also was among the topics. Democrats argued that having immigrants eventually would boost the economy if they had access to quality education. The republicans said the government allows "too large of an influx of foreign illegals" and this makes Americans not want the lower-paying jobs because the wages have been lowered so much.

Though the issues were heated, the debaters left with a friendly feeling in the air. Both sides shook hands after the debate and said they felt positive about the evening.

"The democrats did a great job. They are good people, and I really enjoyed the debate. There was a great atmosphere," said Brett Jensen, senior in electronic journalism.

Black History Month begins

By Alex Peak
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Organizations across campus will recognize the achievements of black leaders when they celebrate Black History Month, which begins today.

This year's theme, developed by the Black Student Union, is "The Legends Ignited the F.L.A.M.E.: Future Leaders Aiming to Manifest Excellence."

Devin Bailey, delegate for the BSU and freshman in open-option, said the group is working to promote awareness of black history.

"We're trying to make people aware of the many attributes made by Africans throughout history," she said.

Many speakers will give presentations and there also will be gallery exhibits and films pertaining to black history across campus in February.

"The exhibit, 'Something to Look Forward To,' is abstract art by 22 distinguished Americans of African descent," said Martha Scott, administrative officer at the Marianna Kistler Beach Museum of Art.

Bill Hutson, curator of the exhibit, will be featured at a lecture at 4:30 p.m. Feb. 16 at the museum.

Hutson is a professor at Franklin and Marshall College, the first location the exhibit took place.

"It's an exhibit that's traveling across the country," Scott said. "We're the second location to have it. The timing just worked out well."

"Something to Look Forward To" will be on exhibit today through April 6.

The Beach Museum also will have a Brown Bag Lunch Film Series, with movies involving black history, at 11:30 a.m. each Tuesday of the month.

Some of the other events taking place on campus:

■ Jan. 26 to Feb. 10: "Black Cowboys and Black Rodeos" at the K-State Student Union art gallery

■ Feb. 1 to April 6: "Something to Look Forward To" at the Beach Museum of Art

■ Feb. 1: Dr. Goddess in a "One Woman Show" at 7 p.m. at Forum Hall

■ Feb. 6: Festival of Nations from 12 to 1 p.m. at the Union Courtyard

■ Feb. 7: Résumé Building Workshop in Union 212

■ Feb. 8: "A Triumph of the Spirit" at 7 p.m. in the Student Union Main Ballroom

City residents respond to 11th Street project

By Logan C. Adams
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

City staff organized a public meeting Tuesday night hoping to get public input on changes to intersections of Fort Riley Boulevard.

They got what they wished for.

"There's obviously a lot of concerned citizens, and they brought up a lot of good points," Robert Ott, City Engineer, said.

About 45 people came to City Hall for a public meeting on a project that would turn 11th Street into a direct link between Fort Riley Boulevard and Poyntz and Bluemont avenues if enacted. Juliette Avenue and 17th Street are the only streets that connect all three downtown thoroughfares.

The plan effectively would reverse the roles of 10th and 11th streets where they meet Fort Riley Boulevard.

Tenth Street has a stoplight where it intersects with Fort Riley Boulevard, but connects with Poyntz and Bluemont Avenues with stop signs.

However, 11th Street has stoplights where it meets Bluemont and Poyntz avenues, but does not connect with Fort Riley Boulevard from the north at all. It attaches to the south end, but it stops at the railroad.

The plan being considered would build a stoplight where 11th Street meets Fort Riley Boulevard, and make several changes along the street to allow for increased traffic. Such changes would have deep effects on the surrounding neighborhood.

The Kansas Department of Transportation has a say in any changes to Fort Riley Boulevard because Kansas Highway 18 runs on it, Ott said. He said they would require that 10th Street be closed off from the north and the leg from the south will be made "right in, right out" by the addition of a concrete median to the middle of Fort Riley Boulevard there.

Howard Wilson, owner of Howie's Recycling at the intersection of Fort Riley Boulevard and 10th Street, opposed the rearrangement. Wilson said it would make his customers and trucks carrying material to and from the business go through residential streets.

"People will adapt, but I hope this isn't set in gold," he said.

Ott said he estimated the project would cost $1.5 million. He said half of it would pay for the changes to Fort Riley Boulevard, and the other half would be for all the work on 11th Street.

Jeff Hancock, director of the Manhattan Department of Public Works, said all funding for the project would likely come from the city.

TO THE POINT Open dialogue important for clashing views

Last night two opposing organizations came together to debate. We commend the College Republicans and Young Democrats for putting dialogue above their personal pride. Both organizations understand the role that discussion and choice play in our political system.

Following the example of these two clubs, we feel these other binary oppositions should set aside their differences and come together for the sake of conversational good:

The Boston Red Sox and the New York Yankees – Quit hogging all the rivalry fun in Major League Baseball. There are 28 other teams in the league.

Smokers and non-smokers – They should just suck it up.

India and Pakistan – Just go ahead and sign that peace treaty.

Lindsay Lohan and Hilary Duff – Stop bickering over movie roles and boy-friends. Disney made both of you famous.

France and the United States – Both cultures are influential. Why not join together to create one superpower?

Pop and soda – They were together when carbonated beverages were called soda pop. Why stay separated?

To the point is an editorial selected and debated by the editorial board and written after a majority opinion is formed. This is the Collegian's official opinion.

Emperor example Penguin film provides insights into marriage

Whereas, I expected to find Jesus in Narnia, I never thought I'd find Jesus in Antarctica.

CODY COOPER

I recently viewed the documentary film "March of the Penguins" about the Emperors of the White Continent.

The animal kingdom has long fascinated me. From the mighty to the meek, Animalia is animated with distinct personalities.

Whether it's the 'wise' owl, the 'kingly' lion, or the 'worker' bee, humankind curiously understands beast through human metaphor.

Surely "sage," "king" and "serf" are mere human descriptions of power relationships among men. Yet, much can be learned from our beastly brethren.

"March of the Penguins" opens with breathtaking vistas of the Antarctic, bathing the viewer in glowing screenshots of gelid whiteness. Colossal chunks of glacial ice jut out from the depths as if they were the result of some Olympian fisticuffs of yore.

Then come those adorable little penguins.

With their flipper-arms, feather tuxedos, and waddle walk – it's enough to make any girl squeal "cute" as she fantasizes about hugging and kissing it until the penguin wishes it'd been eaten by a sea lion.

Was that the penguins' message to humanity? "Squealing women make us all long for a violent death."

These Emperors teach a much more important lesson.

It is amazing what these animals go through. Every Antarctic summer, the Emperors feed to bulk up for the long winter. Then, tummies plump, they embark on an arduous 70-mile march to their breeding ground.

Once at the grounds, the Emperor males court one female. The new couple will remain seasonally monogamous as they parent their chick.

After the mother lays the egg, she must immediately retrace the 70 miles to eat or she'll die. Before departing, the mother ever so delicately transfers the egg to the father's trust. He will guard it under his fat pouch for her two-month absence.

For this harsh period of bitter blizzards and sub-zero temperatures, the fasting father guards the fragile egg, anxiously awaiting his turn to feed. By the time mama returns, dad will have lost much of his body weight.

Upon her return she must quickly find her man among thousands and meet the baby she has never seen.

Together they laboriously take turns trekking, feeding, returning, and nurturing the baby chick until the fledgling is grown.

Truly, these betrothed exemplify the concept "partners in marriage."

The Emperors' marriage is one defined by selfless love. One-hundred fifty mile-per-hour winds, 60-degree-below temperatures and malnourishment couldn't deter a determined husband. Wintry, tempest-ridden, predator-infested terrain couldn't deter a devoted wife.

All that mattered for this avian couple was the best interest of the other and their chick. They had little time for quarreling and divisions. At stake was their very survival – the very survival of their avian marriage.

Watching this film, Christian concepts of love and marriage came to mind.

Christians believe the love between man and wife in marriage should reflect the love between Jesus and His Bride: the Church (all believers).

They believe this true love is not self-seeking, but selfless—subjugating selfish desire in order to serve others. Their example, Jesus, selflessly laid down his life for the world; Christians lay down their lives in return.

The blueprint for marital success is simple.

Seek first to serve the interests of one's spouse over oneself. From their Antarctic throne, this is the message of the "selfless" Emperor Penguins.

Crime shows might make smarter criminals

After two spin-offs and expanding the trend in crime dramas, the original "CSI: Crime Scene Investigation" set in Las Vegas has started to make it harder for officials to track criminals.

KELSEY CHILDRESS

Called the 'CSI effect,' murderers are using techniques they have seen on television to commit murders with less evidence. According to Yahoo! News, investigators have seen an increase in the use of bleach at crime scenes, which destroys DNA evidence.

While many criminals are too dumb to not be caught by trained officials, some people are concerned this trend in crime dramas will in turn produce an increase in the number of crimes committed.

These fears are totally justifiable, considering that while using tricks learned on television might not cover up a murder, any help criminals can get to commit a crime should be examined.

The makers of crime dramas like "CSI" pride themselves on providing the viewers with a witty and smart angle on solving crimes. To tone down the use of cover-up techniques or ways to find evidence would most likely destroy the entire premise and plotline of the show.

There have been no studies on the "CSI" effect, but the correlation between the increases in clean crime scenes and viewing certain television shows would be hard to determine.

Even though "CSI" provides a fictitious inside look into the mind of a criminal, it should not be totally blamed for the increase in 'smarter' crimes.

Maybe criminals are just getting smarter.

If we are going to blame television for the increase in crime, then we should also blame the Internet, where it is easy to gain information on how to make a bomb, buy a gun or any other supplies needed to cover up or commit a crime.

Courses on forensics and criminal investigation also are starting to be offered at trade schools and community colleges, making it easier to gain the same knowledge insiders have. Books and other media also are accessible to anybody who wants to learn more about crime, evidence and forensics.

In addition to criminals copying techniques on television, jurors in law trials also are playing into the concept of forensic evidence.

An article in USA Today said that many jurors are expecting harder evidence of the crime committed to sentence those put on trial.

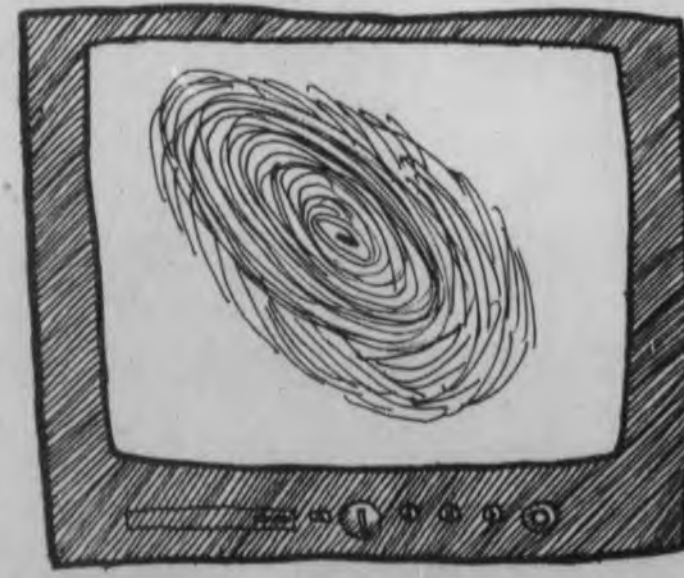

Although this might be good for defense attorneys, it might prove to be unfortunate for prosecutors who have to cater to the jurors' high expectations.

Overall, whether the "CSI" effect turns out to be a good or bad thing, it's important to remember not to cast blame or turn praise on any particular aspect of popular media in reference to crime.

There are so many different venues of information that it's impossible to figure out the source of any increase or decrease in social problems. There will always be certain television shows that will push the limits or provide a reason for those at home to complain.

Comedic play opens Thursday

By Brandon R. Gonzalez
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Opening the spring season of K-State Theater is the play, "The Underpants," a Steve Martin adaptation of a German comedy by Carl Sternheim.

"The Underpants" plays at 8 p.m. Feb. 2 to 4 and Feb. 8 to 11 at Nichols Theatre.

"The Underpants" was chosen because we've been really happy with the response that audiences have shown toward Steve Martin plays," said Marci Mauller, associate professor in the Department of Speech, Communication, Theatre and Dance.

The play is set in 1910 and follows the life of a young housewife named Louise, who becomes a local sensation when her panties fall during a public gathering.

"Louise is naive, not too aware of her sexuality and how it can affect men and really just looking for love," said Becky Morphis, sophomore in theater, who plays Louise.

Gertrude, played by Kinzie Jo Nelson, senior in theater, acts out a scene with Becky Morphis, sophomore in theater, during a full dress rehearsal for "The Underpants" Tuesday evening in Nichols Auditorium.

The play is directed by K-State alumnus, Dan Shea, with the set and costumes designed by Kathy Voecks, assistant professor in the Department of Speech, Communication, Theatre and Dance, and graduate assistant Mary Johnston.

Patricia's Undercover, 1224 Moro St., and Pizza Hut, 1121 Moro St., are sponsoring the play by donating funds and food.

"Someone came up to me and asked if I'd be a sponsor, and I said 'sure,'" Patricia Yeager, owner of Patricia's Undercover, said. "I sponsor K-State activities from time to time."

Ticket prices will range from $7.50 to $11.50 and can be purchased by visiting or calling the McCain Auditorium box office, noon to 5 p.m. at (785) 532-6428 or online at www.ksu.edu/sctd.

"It sounds like it would probably be fun, but I don't have the money," Erica Starns, freshman in history, said. "If I can get my boyfriend to take me then I might go."

Morphis said they have been preparing for the play since the beginning of the semester.

"We've been working on the play since the first week of January and we've all put a lot of time and effort into this play," Morphis said. "I don't have very much money, but I still buy tickets to support K-State sports teams. People should do the same for the theater program."

Dierks Bentley headlining concert at Bramlage

By Kelsey Noel
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Dierks Bentley, recipient of the Country Music Association's 2005 Horizon Award, is coming to Manhattan as part of his concert tour.

His concert is scheduled to begin at 8:30 p.m. Feb. 23 in Bramlage Coliseum.

This is not Bentley's first trip to the Manhattan area.

"Dierks is (an artist) who has been at Country Stampede and was very popular," said Jim Muller, manager of operations for K-State athletics.

Bentley
COUNTRY MUSIC STAR

"He is someone we and the promoters felt would do well in this marketplace," he said.

Muller said there are several events planned for the evening.

He said there will be a pre-concert show beginning at about 6 p.m.

"People can win the opportunity to meet Dierks or win free CD's and t-shirts," Muller said.

Following the pre-concert show, Shooter Jennings is scheduled to perform. Jennings, who recently released his first album, is the son of deceased recording artist Waylon Jennings.

Finally, Bentley will perform songs from his two albums.

Several students said they hope to attend the concert.

Steve Madewell, senior in management, said he is interested in going because he enjoys Bentley's music.

"Dierks is pretty good," he said. "I like his music because a lot of it is upbeat and really fun to listen to."

Natalie Zych, junior in dietetics, said she is interested in buying a ticket as well.

"(The ticket price) seems really reasonable," she said. "I'd like to go because it's something different to do and not many people come in to perform like this."

Allison Childs, sophomore in open option, said she hopes the performance is exciting.

"My favorite kind of concert is one where everyone is loud and having a good time," she said.

Muller said there will be enough reserved seating and general admission tickets for 4,500 people.

Tickets go on sale at 10 a.m. Thursday for $24.50.

Tickets can be purchased through the Bramlage ticket office or at any Ticketmaster location.

They also can be ordered online at www.k-statesports.com, or by calling (800) 221-2287.

Extreme sports losing edge, novelty

When in the world did everything become extreme?

Why are Doritos and a box of Jell-O extreme? I can now top off my extreme meal of chips and gelatin with an MDX, Mountain Dew's new extreme energy drink. It's all because of one event that took place 11 years ago, one sunny afternoon in California called the X Games.

The brainchild of ESPN, which has spawned a corporate marketing giant, officially came to a close last night as the winter portion of the event was capped off in Aspen, Colo., its home through the year 2010.

This year's version is the 10th installment of the Winter X Games, in the same number of years.

The Olympic games are set to start in nine days in Torino, Italy.

Torino will be the 20th winter installment in the history of the games, which date back to 1924 when the winter games officially split away from the summer games.

Let's break this down really quickly here.

The Olympics, the most prestigious games in the world, have only happened 20 times in 82 years.

If they went by X Games logic, they would be going into the 82nd games on Feb. 10. There is not a reason why these extreme athletes can't take a year or two off from the games.

Go and take a break to fix a few broken bones.

Get in your Nissan Xterra and take a vacation.

Take in a few hours sitting at home on your computer browsing the Web using your wireless Internet connection from the Apple AirPort Extreme router.

Put on some Right Guard Xtreme deodorant to cover up those extreme odors and follow that up with an extreme shave, using the Schick Xtreme III razor with its triple-blade action.

The concept of the X Games and extreme advertisements is tired, and the something needs to be changed.

When you come to expect something every year, it becomes stale, especially when it is the same athletes competing in the same events every year.

With the Olympics, most athletes (not named Carl Lewis) only have about two games in them before they are considered too old to compete. If you miss one year of the X Games, no big deal, you can just come back the following year.

If you miss an Olympic games, there might never be another chance to ever reach that plateau.

Just ask the 1980 United States Olympic team, which was not allowed to compete because President Jimmy Carter boycotted the summer games set to take place in Moscow.

I'm sure there were a few names in there that lost the chance to medal because of political reasons.

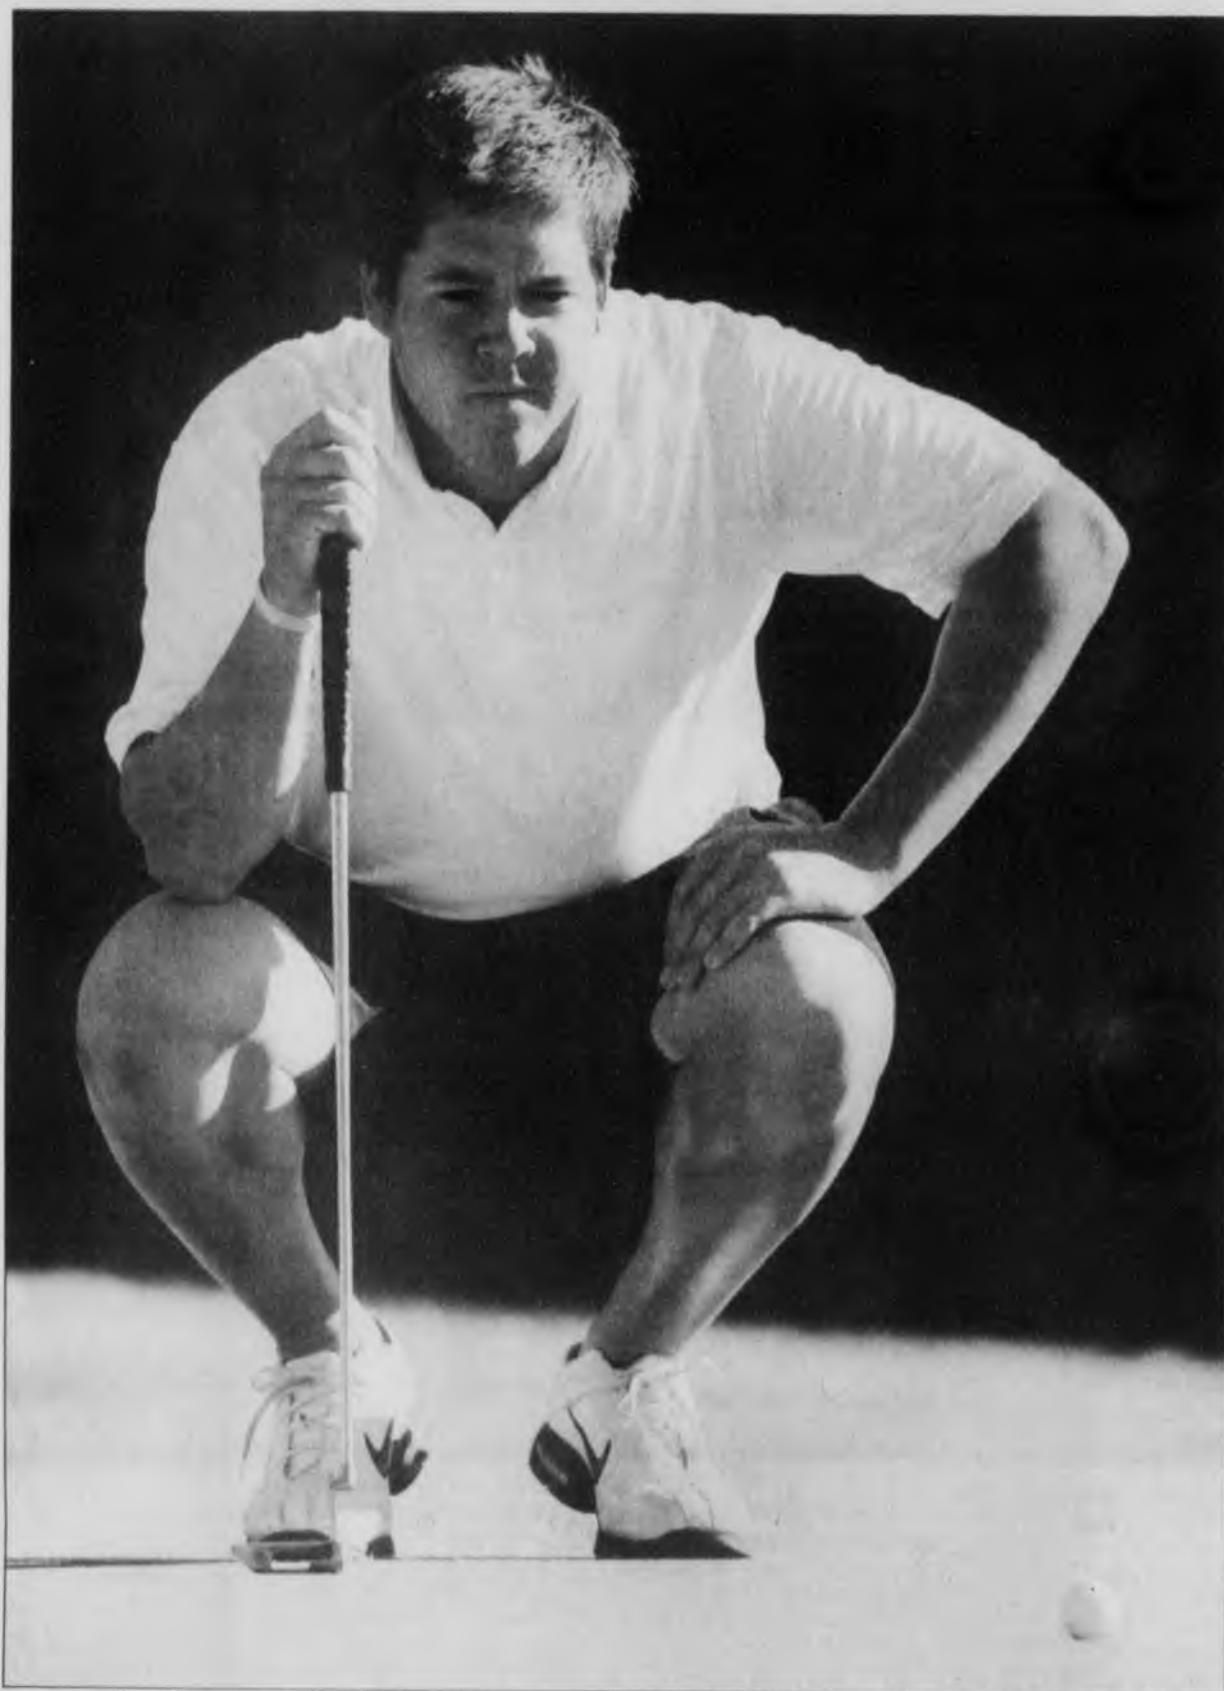

You don't have to be like the Olympics and have the X Games every four years — have it every two.

That way there will always be some sort of extremeness happening every other year, whether it is on the snow or asphalt.

The X Games need to change, and it will not take anything too extreme to fix its problems.

Senior's game, competition speak for themselves

By Austin Meek
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

It's the middle of January, and Ben Kern is at the golf course.

A blustery winter wind is howling in from the north, the kind that sends tee shots into the trees and fair-weather golfers scurrying for the clubhouse. But it takes more than a little winter weather to keep Kern, senior on the K-State golf team, from getting in an extra practice round.

"I try to set a good example," Kern said. "(That means) being out here and practicing whenever I can, no matter how cold it is."

Don't be fooled, though. Days like this make Kern long for his native Arizona.

"Arizona is probably 70 degrees right now," he said with a chuckle.

As a kid in Tucson, Ariz., Kern grew up with a golf club in his hand. He credits his father with introducing him to the game.

"He started me real young," Kern said. "I was playing when I was about one year old."

Kern enjoyed a solid career at Tucson's Palo Verde High School, highlighted by a state championship in 2001. His accomplishments caught the attention of the K-State coaches. Although Tucson and Manhattan are more than a thousand miles apart, Kern said he felt right at home in Manhattan.

"I liked the town, liked the golf course, liked the coach," Kern said.

K-State golf coach Tim Norris, said

Kern's golf background and willingness to learn have helped him excel at the collegiate level.

"He comes from a golf family," Norris said. "There's chiseling rock and there's molding clay. With Ben, it's like molding clay."

Norris called Kern a "silent assassin" — a player who makes his teammates better and leads by example.

"It's an inspiration to a lot of these guys, especially the underclassmen, to be able to watch one of the top players in the country prepare," Norris said.

Kern said he thinks he can manage his emotions well on the golf course.

"When I'm in competition, I'm a really quiet guy," Kern said. "If I have a bad hole, I won't show my emotions. I keep to myself, play my own game. If I have a bad hole on the second hole, there are still 16 holes to get it back."

These days, bad holes are few and far between for Kern.

In fall 2005, he led the Wildcats in stroke average (71.4) and rounds under par (11). Kern's 8-under 205 at the Cleveland State Invitational was the second-lowest 54-hole total in school history.

Norris said he expects even greater things from Kern this spring.

"His game is solid," Norris said. "He'll be playing on some courses he's played before. You always want your seniors to go out on a good note."

Kern said he hopes to go out on

SPT | 218 athletes make Big 12 Honor Roll

K-State had a program-best 218 of its student-athletes honored on the Big 12 Conference Commissioner's Honor Roll for the fall 2005 semester.

In a sport-by-sport breakdown, the women's rowing program placed 45 student athletes on the honor roll, followed by equestrian (41), football (25), baseball (23), men's track and field (22), women's track and field (20), volleyball (13), women's basketball (9), men's golf (7), women's tennis (6), women's golf (4) and men's basketball (3).

The Big 12 Commissioner's Honor Roll is an inclusive honor for all varsity sports sponsored by the membership of the league. The Honor Roll is recorded and released each semester to recognize student athletes who have excelled in the classroom with a 3.0 or better GPA. The total number of student athletes honored in the fall was a program-best for K-State in the 10-year history of the league.

SPT | Illinois files second appeal of mascot decision

CHAMPAIGN, Ill. — The University of Illinois on Tuesday filed another appeal of an NCAA decision that would require the school to drop its Chief Illiniwek athletic mascot and logo before it could host any postseason competition.

The appeal is the university's second attempt to persuade the National Collegiate Athletic Association to reverse its decision that Chief Illiniwek was an example of "hostile and abusive" American Indian imagery.

A staff review committee in November upheld the "hostile and abusive" classification of Illiniwek, but allowed the school to keep its Illini and Fighting Illini nicknames.

The policy is scheduled to take effect today, but the university asked the committee to postpone any enforcement of the policy, should the appeal be denied, until after the completion of the current academic year, said UI spokesman Tom Hardy.

Hornets to play in Oklahoma City for most of 2006-07

By Jeff Letzke
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

OKLAHOMA CITY — The Hornets will play most of their home games in Oklahoma City next season with New Orleans still recovering from Hurricane Katrina.

The NBA announced Tuesday that the Hornets will play 35 games in Oklahoma City and six in New Orleans in 2006-07.

NBA commissioner David

Stern said in a statement the league remains committed to returning to New Orleans, but "for now, our collective interests are best served by having the team play the bulk of its 2006-07 schedule in Oklahoma City."

"However, we are hopeful that the team will be in a position to return to New Orleans full time beginning in the 2007-08 season."

The agreement reached between the state of Louisiana and the Hornets allows the team to amend its lease agreement with the New Orleans Arena.

"The agreement reached today will ensure the Hornets' stability while the New Orleans market fully recovers and, at the same time, maintains our presence in the NBA," Louisiana Gov. Kathleen Blanco said.

Stern also said the NBA will enter exclusive negotiations to bring the 2008 All-Star Game to New Orleans.

"From everything we have seen and heard, we have little doubt that New Orleans will soon regain its place among the world's premiere cities for hosting major sporting events," Stern said.

The NBA also has agreed to have its annual marketing meetings in New Orleans in October, with some 300-400 people expected to attend.

"The permanent identity of New Orleans as an NBA city is important to the economy of our entire region," Blanco said. "New Orleans has always been a great city for big events, and we are confident that we can quickly negotiate a deal to bring the All-Star Game to New Orleans."

In 19 games at Oklahoma City's Ford Center this season, the Hornets have averaged 18,546 fans, including 10 sellouts.

The surprising young team is 22-22.

Auction Web site offers dating, educational tools

By Annette Lawless
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

In an is worth $100. At least that is how much he is worth on a new college student auction Web site, Uflipit.com. And for $100 a pop, bidders also can win a date with Greg, Josh, Eric and Jarrad - students at Fordham University and New York University.

"Obviously, you can't auction yourself off for sex or anything too risqué," said site co-founder Jarrad Lewis, a recent University of Maryland graduate. "But it's an attraction, a fun spin on something our competitors don't offer."

Lewis and Uflipit.com co-founder Greg Soroka, have been developing the site for nearly 10 months. The two launched the site last week, with almost 400 registered members and 70 participating outside companies.

Aside from auctioning dates, Lewis said the site also features a variety of sales one would find at a mall. Popular sales include homework, essays, textbooks, furniture and posters. Some products are available at the click of a button. Once they win the auction, it can be downloaded right to their computer's desktop.

"We were just sitting around when we were graduating, and the idea came to me," Lewis said. "Basically, I had my couch to sell, my TV to sell - nobody would buy them. How could I sell it to 40,000 people on campus?" Instead of lathering more buildings with flyers, Lewis said he had something more practical in mind - building a universal Web site. The Uflipit.com Web site offers students the opportunity to auction or trade goods like they would on eBay or Amazon.com.

There are a few perks to using Uflipit.com, Lewis said. The site is restricted to students and university officials - at least anyone with a [dot]edu e-mail account. Bidders can search the site by school, if desired, allowing them to look for material that's more classroom-specific, Lewis said.

Students will be attracted to the site "not only because other students are participating in it, but also because it is free," Lewis said. Most competitors charge for listing fees, item or other transaction fees, but Lewis said he and Soroka want students to benefit from their peers.

Upon launch of the site, more than 2,000 items have been sold by students and businesses. Some K-State students have taken advantage of the site, auctioning classroom notes and homework for political science and public relations classes.

"Sure it might be cheap to copy off someone's homework or to borrow their old notes," Afton Wilkins, junior in

Tag-team dating leads to discomfort, regret

I am starting to think all guys are freaks. I have had one bad date after another, and I wonder if there is any point in looking anymore. At what point should we stop putting ourselves through the B.S. of trying to meet someone and just start accepting our single lives the way they are?

LAUREN ROHRER

Wow, nothing new there. Every single girl in Manhattan thinks that from time to time.

How are we supposed to believe "the one" is out there when bad dates happen as often as parking tickets?

I once dated a guy that called at least three times a day and just wouldn't leave me alone.

Another time I went out with a guy who was so intimidated by me that he randomly brought his roommate with him on the date ... yeah, I know, uncomfortable.

So yeah, I'd say freaks exist, and they are difficult to weed out. There's nothing wrong with being single, and you have plenty of time.

I know it seems like everyone is pairing off, but that's only because you aren't one of them. The right guy will surface eventually. They always do.

As for the freaks, they will soon enough find their way to the carnival - it's only natural that they should.

I had a date the other night and I had to pay my half. Is that right? Isn't the guy supposed to handle that?

Seriously, things have changed since the 16th century. As a rule, most students are flat broke.

We regularly use credit cards in Aggieville and whine because an I.O.U. doesn't exactly do it for the Cashier's Office.

In these troubled times of financial disarray, a guy might not be able to pay all the time.

My advice to you is to get over it. Yeah, tough love time, buddy. Because paying for your meals has a certain amount of satisfaction to it (you are the one eating it) and because women like you make the rest of us look bad.

I gave my phone number to a basketball player while I was drunk (and being my sexy self), and now he calls me, and I feel nervous and unsure of what to say. What should I do?

The only reason he seems to be on a social pedestal is because you put him there. If he's really out of your league, why the hell is he calling you?

Confidence is sexy (if it wasn't, my dating life would suck). The reason he is calling you is because for a moment you let go of your neurosis and just let him really see you.

So he plays basketball. Big deal. Odds are he puts his pants on one leg at a time, just like the rest of us.

My landlord is already asking us to renew our lease, but we just aren't sure if we want to just yet. What could I say to him to keep him off our backs for a while?

That's a shame. I would think most landlords in town would be like mine and be sympathetic to the fact that you are in college, and there are loads of extenuating circumstances.

If this guy is playing like this then you'll have to be direct. People in this town will try to push you around simply because you are a student.

Stand your ground. Your business and money are just as important as everyone else's.

Dog grooming options available in Manhattan

Business employs do-it-yourself method

By Wendy Haun
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

When looking for a place to groom a dog, there are several options available in Manhattan.

Claire & Harley's A Dog Bath and Boutique, 108 N. Third Street, offers a non-traditional way of grooming dogs.

Amy Goode, owner of Claire & Harley's, said the boutique is a do-it-yourself business.

"We provide everything for you," she said. "We have stainless steel tubs that are made especially for dogs."

Goode said the tubs are built to eliminate the messiness of washing a dog.

"The dogs are held in the tubs by steel arms," she said. "It's like going to a car wash for dogs."

This might sound complicated, Goode said, but the staff helps new customers with the process.

"We explain everything and help them out," she said.

"We walk them through the process and show them what to do."

"We clean up the mess and you don't have to worry about it."

Landen Wilson, freshman in history, said he groomed his dog at Claire & Harley's. He said the appeal of the grooming business was the simplicity.

"We can wash our dog and not get our tub at home dirty," he said. "The soap is built in the water, so it's easier to just come here and do it."

Another pet grooming business in Manhattan is Bark Avenue Canine Designs, 607 N. 11th St.

Owner Barb Grimwood said the business does not usually give discounts to students.

"We try to cut them some slack, but we don't offer a student rate," she said. "Generally, we run coupons in the Collegian to get students to try to come in. If they look for them, they are there."

signs has been open for almost five years, and Grimwood said she has worked in this business for several years.

"I've been grooming for 17 years, and I decided that it was time to do it myself," she said.

Grimwood said Bark Avenue Canine Designs offers discounts for a customer's first grooming.

She said the business can groom most dogs, except for the larger ones.

"We don't have enough space to handle Great Danes and Mastiff-type dogs," she said.

Business, education among nation's most popular majors

By Kelsey Noel
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

By collecting data from colleges reporting offered majors and undergrad enrollment in those majors, The Princeton Review has compiled a list of the most popular majors throughout institutions nationwide.

Ranking in the top three on the Princeton Review's Web site were business administration and management, psychology, and elementary education.

Ike Ehie, associate dean of the Department of Management, said he thinks business is a popular major is because upon finishing, students can immediately begin their career.

"A business degree is a professional degree," he said. "Once a student is finished in four years, they can go into the field as a professional businessperson."

He said he also believes having a broad field makes business a popular major.

About four years ago, the College of Business Administration became so popular that the number of students was getting too high for the ratio of students to faculty, he said.

"We have seen a slight decline in students, but it was by design," he said. "We began enforcing enrollment management by raising the GPA (grade point average) requirements and adding a tuition surcharge. Both of these impacted enrollment."

Ehie said the College of Business Administration still has about 2,600 students, and he said he felt that number was more manageable.

Paul Burden, assistant dean of the Department of Elementary Education, said he is not surprised elementary education ranked so high.

"I think a lot of people are interested in a career working with children," he said. "Typically, education is a stable career that provides satisfaction; not necessarily financial satisfaction, but satisfaction nonetheless."

The ranking of elementary education as a popular major appears to be consistent with K-State, Burden said.

"We always have a fairly even enrollment here," he said. "We're the largest teacher education program in the state of Kansas, and we turn out more education graduates than any other university in the state."

Burden said the success rate of K-State graduates in elementary education is high as well.

In the Career and Employment Services report for last year, 132 of the 147 graduates they contacted are employed as teachers, with 115 of them teaching in Kansas, he said.

Studies find stress causes illness

By Brandon R. Gonzalez
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Stress can literally make you sick to your stomach, according to health officials.

"For some college students, stress makes them sick and their immune system gets run down," said Tammy Mikinski, licensed psychologist at the Sastun Center of Integrative Health Care in Mission, Kan.

According to the American Institute of Stress, 43 percent of all adults suffer adverse health effects due to stress.

"When you don't deal with stress, it can cause anxiety and eventually lead to depression," said Sherry Benton, psychologist and assistant director of University Counseling Services.

There are two types of stress: eustress and distress.

The Dictionary of Psychology defines eustress as action-enhancing stress, which can help increase performance and motivate people to action.

"I don't get stressed out very often, but one thing that does stress me out is driving other people's cars," Derek Heathcote, freshman in mass communications, said.

Heathcote said he believes the stress he experiences while driving another person's car helps him perform as a driver.

The Dictionary of Psychology defines distress as stress that decreases a person's ability to cope, fatigues the body and causes either physical or psychological problems.

"I mostly get stressed around testing time," Matt Reed, junior in construction science management, said. "My lower back starts to hurt, like I have a kink in it."

Some psychologists claim poor time management as the primary cause of stress among college students.

"Students need to balance the social demands of college and the academic demands," Mikinski said.

The University of South Florida's Counseling Center for Human Development recommends maintaining a daily schedule, setting priorities and physically writing down the most important items so as to help clarify thinking and highlight important goals.

Ryan Mortimer, freshman in wildlife park management and conservation, said he uses hunting to cope with stress.

"It's not just the hunting, but being outside with clean air and no one around," Mortimer said.

The AIS reports 75 to 90 percent of all visits to primary care physicians are for stress-related complaints or disorders.

K-State students seeking help coping with stress can contact Counseling Services at (785) 532-6927.

Counseling Services offers short term counseling to registered K-State students, which can help in the areas of decision-making, crisis intervention, solution, adjustment and matters of personal concern.

"A person should seek help when stress interferes with (their) ability to function," Benton said.

RESTAURANT | Live bands, location, small size contribute to Little Grill's cultural dining experience

Stack said. "I see a lot of familiar faces, and more familiar faces keep adding to that."

News of the grill has spread since it opened four years ago, Stack said, but not because of advertising.

"We do no advertising ourselves. It's strictly word of mouth," he said.

The combination of regular and new customers, many of whom are students and military personnel, can make for a colorful crowd.

"We have one of the most diverse group of customers I've ever seen," Stack said.

Because of the restaurant's popularity, Stack said he recommends grabbing a good seat early.

"If you're not here by 6:30 (in the evening), you're going to be waiting a little bit," he said.

In addition to food, the grill often hosts live bands.

Kenrick, who cooks, also plays with a reggae band on occasion after the kitchen closes.

He said the arrangement works out just fine.

"I always wanted to be my own boss," he said. "I like to cook and I like to play music, and this gives me an opportunity to do both."

Though he enjoys his work, Kenrick said running a business is a stressful affair.

"It's a lot of work ... going to bed and thinking about what you're going to cook tomorrow, can you be as consistent as you were the day before," he said.

For Kenrick, the experience is about bringing a little bit of the Caribbean to the midwest.

"I try to expose as much of my culture as I can," he said.

For some, the restaurant is a welcome taste of home.

"I'm actually Jamaican," said Omar Scott, a soldier stationed at Fort Riley. "This is like a big comfort to me. I didn't think there'd be any Jamaican restaurants out in Kansas."

Co-owner Cathy said the restaurant was a long time in the making.

She and Kenrick met eight years ago in Mexico and spent a long time working to get the business off the ground.

"We would do side jobs, wallpapering or painting to get enough money to buy a few chairs," she said.

Though the grill is off the beaten path, Cathy said she thinks the unusual location and small size is part of the charm.

"I think people enjoy getting out of town for something different," she said.

She also said they had considered expanding the restaurant but had decided against it.

Whatever form it may take, the Little Grill will likely be around for a while, Cathy said.

"It's just built on reputation, I guess," she said. "People just started coming."

smooth and articulate," Herspring said. "The speech was well put together and well-delivered. He has really come a long way in five years."

Gov. Tim Kaine D-Va., delivered the Democratic party response and said the Bush administration has made many poor decisions.

"Our federal government should serve the American people," Kaine said. "But that mission is frustrated by this administration's poor choices and bad management."

Kaine also stressed that the Democrats already were leading the way in alternative energy sources.

"Democrats at both the state and national levels are leading the way on energy reforms, calling for greater public investments for alternative, advanced energy technologies," he said. "These investments will promote energy independence, boost the nation's economy, create jobs and strengthen national security."

Herspring said Bush's tactic of making the energy policy his own is common.

"In a political sense, Bush basically stole the Democrats' arguments from them," Herspring said. "He put the Democrats in a position where they have to argue their own points."

the sweetest note of all by winning a national championship.

"My goal is to win nationals," Kern said.

"That's everyone's goal as a college golfer. I know I can play my own game and play well," he said.

The NCAA championship tournament will take place May 31 through June 3 in Sunriver, Ore.

Kern plans to graduate in December 2006 with a social science degree.

After that, he said he hopes to return to Arizona and play golf professionally. "Once I graduate I plan to move to Phoenix and play the mini-tours out there," Kern said.

Kern dreams of playing on the PGA tour, but says he's in no hurry to finish his career at K-State.

"I've loved my four years here," Kern said.

"I wish I had a couple more."

he was given the Nobel Peace Prize.

Her husband's birthday was first observed as a national holiday in 1986. The holiday is now celebrated every year on Jan. 16.

Whitney Wilborn, sophomore in political science, said she admired King's ability to carry on what her husband started after his death.

"Mrs. King continued her husband's work during rough times in America," Wilborn said. "She was an inspiration and role model for women everywhere."

In 1969, King founded the multimillion-dollar Martin Luther King Jr. Center for Non-violent Social Change, which is involved with issues such as violence, hunger, unemployment, voting rights and racism.

Pat Agwu, secretary and fund-raising chair of Alpha Phi Alpha Fraternity Inc., said he was surprised to hear about King's death.

"We lost another leader in the civil rights movement, but it was comforting knowing that she died a painless death in her sleep," said Agwu, a graduate student in counseling and student development.

and that he is an ideologue with a political agenda, his record, his testimony, and the testimony of his colleagues and others who have worked with him dispel those allegations."

According to The Associated Press, only one of the Republicans in the Senate voted against Alito, and only four Senate Democrats voted in favor of Alito's confirmation.

Some Democratic senators attempted unsuccessfully to block Alito's nomination Monday with a filibuster.

Roberts said in his statement that Alito's confirmation process highlights the strong partisanship in the Senate.

"This trend of partisan bickering further threatens the comity and respect that has long been the standard for conducting Senate business," Roberts said in his statement. "The tenor and manner of questioning or, grilling as referred to in the news headlines, of Judge Alito frays the spirit of our Constitutional fabric under which we operate."

"I call on my colleagues to work together to raise the level of discourse in these hallowed halls of Congress."

Women learning to survive late scoring rallies

K-State's Danielle Zanotti fights for control of the ball in K-State's game against Kansas on Jan. 25. The Jayhawks came back in the second half, but Zanotti and her teammates have made a concerted effort to stifle second-half comebacks.

Young K-State team works on maintaining intensity throughout full 40-minute game

By Matt Gorney
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The K-State women have repeatedly proven their ability to play the game — in the first half.

It's the second half, however, that remains a little uncertain.

Through the past four games, the Cats have outscored their opponents by an average of 8.8 points in the first half.

In the second half, the K-State opponents have outscored the Cats in three of the last four contests, Kansas being the only exception.

"I think when we get up big, we put our guard down, and we can slack off or let down our intensity some," freshman Marlies Gipson said. "I think as a team, when we're up, we just need to keep pushing for as much as we can and just don't slack off on the defensive end."

Gipson was awarded Big 12 Conference Rookie of the Week honors for her 12-point, 11-rebound performance against Iowa State on Sunday. It was her first career double-double.

She said communication on defense is an issue the team is facing. In their last game against Iowa State, the Wildcats were able to contain the explosive Cyclone offense in the first half, holding them to 28 percent shooting from the field.

In the second half, Iowa State was able to get around the Cats' defense and the Cyclone shooting skyrocketed to 57.7 percent.

"With Iowa State, we kind of quit talking on the screens at the end," Gipson said. "I think if we just keep up our talk and our intensity — keep the drive, the wanting to win — hopefully it will come out in the end."

She also said Coach Deb Patterson has used team practices to ensure, once the intensity is established, it is maintained throughout an entire 40-minute game.

Patterson said the runs Big 12 teams have made in the second half do not concern her as much as people might think.

"I think what people don't understand, is that's the nature of a 40-minute game," Patterson said. "As competitors and as coaches, that's not nearly as disconcerting as it is to the average Joe. That's the game."

"If you think you're going to get a big lead and someone's not coming back at you in this league, you need to be in another league because the Big 12 is all about nip and tuck to the final basket."

Patterson, in her 10th year as K-State coach, said she was proud of her team's fighting spirit when opponents have attempted to make comebacks in the second half.

Despite second-half comebacks in the past four games, the Wildcats still outscored those four opponents by a six-point average and are ranked fourth in the Big 12 in both scoring offense and scoring defense.

"I'm not nearly as concerned about the runs teams make on us, I think that's inevitable," Patterson said. "I think it's how you answer those runs, it's the toughness to keep stepping up and our basketball team has done that."

Freshman Danielle Zanotti said K-State still needs to work on eliminating second-half runs but has seen improvement during the last couple of games.

"It's not a 20-minute game, and I think that in the second half, we just need to bring more focus on the game itself," Zanotti said. "I think that in the past couple of games, KU went on a run late, Iowa State went on a run late and we just really responded well."

Wildcats look to avenge loss, secure 2nd place in Big 12

By Matthew Girard
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

K-State fans might have to excuse the Wildcats for wanting a little more than just a win against the Missouri Tigers tonight in Bramlage Coliseum.

The Wildcats (15-4, 5-3) are looking to avenge a 68-42 loss to the Tigers (15-4, 5-2) in Columbia, Mo., Jan. 7. K-State's 42 points against the Tigers was its lowest point-total since a 72-41 loss to Texas Tech, Jan. 31, 2001, but junior Claire Coggins said the Wildcats are a different team than the one that traveled to Missouri.

"They embarrassed us at their house the last time we played them, and I think we've taken so many steps since, and we've gotten so much better since that game," Coggins said. "It's going to be fun to get in the gym and really attack them and show them our game."

Although the first meeting between K-State and Missouri was a conference divisional game, it was only the second game of the conference season. Tonight's tilt is for second place behind No. 14-ranked Oklahoma.

The Tigers are 3-2 in their last five games, but have lost their last two road games, while the Wildcats are on a two-game win streak and are 3-0 at home since the conference season began. K-State also comes off of a nine-point road win at Iowa State, which was just the third home loss for the Cyclones this season.

Despite the confidence boost of another conference road win, Coggins said Missouri will be a tough test.

"Missouri is a lot more athletic than Iowa State is, and that will be a challenge for us," Coggins said.

Junior Twiggy McIntyre, who was the only Wildcat to score in double figures (14 points) in Columbia, said the outcome of the game will come down to heart.

"It's going to be whoever wants it more," McIntyre said. "The numbers are pretty even, so it's going to come down to who wants the game more."

Offensively and defensively, Missouri and K-State are neck-and-neck in the conference in scoring and defensive scoring. The Tigers are fourth in offensive scoring (71.7 points per game) and the Wildcats are fifth, averaging 71.1 ppg. On the defensive side of the ball, Missouri ranks second in defensive scoring, allowing 58.2 ppg and the Wildcats are close behind at No. 4, allowing 59.5 ppg.

Coach Deb Patterson said she is looking forward to the rematch.

"I'm not sure that who we were the first time we played Missouri, I'm not sure that we are the same kind of basketball team," Patterson said. "I know they have gotten better, and I know we've gotten better, and it will be fun to see where we both are at this point in time in the season."

With only eight games left in the regular season, K-State players are well aware of the magnitude of getting the win against Missouri.

"It (the game) is vital," McIntyre said. "This is a time when we separate ourselves."

Cats focusing on improvements against Baylor

Transition and rebounding key for tonight's road game

By Angie Hanson
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Baylor might be 0-6 in Big 12 Conference play and last – or close to last – in nearly all Big 12 standings.

At the same time, the Bears (0-6, 0-6) are flying under most teams' radar, and that is the main reason they're still a potential threat to K-State, junior Cartier Martin said.

"They really don't have anything to lose, so they're going to come out and play as hard as they can," Martin said.

After the Wildcats' 79-75 loss to Colorado on Saturday at the Coors Event Center, K-State (12-5, 3-3) has identified some things that need improving.

Rebounding – both offensive and defensive – and getting back on transitions are two areas the Cats have paid special attention to in practice since Saturday, Curtis Allen, sophomore reserve guard, said.

"We just need to rebound," Allen said. "Colorado scored 30 points on offensive rebounds and transition, so in practice today, we did all full-court stuff. That's our main focus right now – trying to get defense and board."

Martin reaffirmed Allen's comments and said quick, smooth transitions are going to be crucial for a win against Baylor in Waco, Texas.

"Transition is a big key in the next game," Martin said of tonight's matchup. "They're going to run in transition. We've got to get back on defensive transition and get ahead of the ball."

K-State at Baylor

Baylor marks K-State's fourth Big 12 road game, and it is obvious the road's been a struggle for the Cats. They are 1-2 in the Big 12 and 1-5 on the season, but Martin insists the road is not the issue.

"I don't think playing on the road is a problem," Martin said. "Obviously, we went to KU and got a win, and that's one of the toughest places to play."

Baylor has the 3-2 home court advantage against the Cats, but K-State is 3-4 in its last four outings against the Bears.

The Ferrell Center in Waco is no Allen Fieldhouse, but Coach Jim Wooldridge has noticed the Bears' consistent progression this season. They are coming off a 72-70 loss to Texas A&M on Saturday, which is quite a change for the Baylor team that lost its previous five games by a 24-point average.

"In the A&M game, they (Baylor) shot the ball well, their guard play was really quick," Wooldridge said. "They're getting better. They have good athletes, particularly guards, who play off the dribble and are shot takers."

Sophomore Curtis Allen argues a call during the second half against Texas A&M. Allen has stepped up big for the Wildcats as an energetic reserve off the bench.

Indeed, Baylor All-American guard Aaron Bruce contributed to the Bears' season-high 16 3-pointers against A&M with six of his own. He is averaging 11.7 ppg in the Big 12.

One reassuring aspect in the loss to Colorado was junior Lance Harris' ability to find his offense again. He scored 23 points on 10-for-12 shooting – something K-State hasn't seen out of the guard since he scored 26 points against Longwood on Dec. 5.

One quality performance doesn't mean Harris is automatically bumped to the starting five, though, Wooldridge said.

"There's no set lineup," Wooldridge said in Monday's teleconference. "If he starts playing better and more consistent and impacts our winning, we'll make a change."

As of Monday, Wooldridge said he was still not pleased with his team's exhibition against Colorado. He hadn't thought much about Baylor, and he warned, as he did after K-State's loss to Nebraska, that if his players didn't respond well in practice, there would be problems.

"The focal point today will be us," Wooldridge said. "If we're not coachable by the end of today, we have a problem."

Free throws pose a challenge for both men's and women's squads

By Angie Hanson
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The intense competition between the 10 players on the court is one of the reasons college basketball is so popular.

But sometimes, the most heated action isn't on the court, and it isn't between opposing teams.

Every now and then, the most frustrating battles are the ones fans can't see — the ones inside the players' heads.

The free-throw slump is a common internal struggle, and it can be one of the most challenging for players to dig themselves out of.

Recently, it's reared its ugly head in Manhattan.

The K-State men's and women's basketball teams are in the upper half of the Big 12 Conference in free-throw percentage — with the men at No. 4 (70.3 percent) and women at No. 3 (71.1 percent) — but lately, the freebies have been an issue for both squads.

Sophomore David Hoskins, a post/guard for the Wildcats, is one such player who is all too familiar with the depreciation.

"I kinda fell into a little slump with my free throws," said Hoskins, who is 16-of-33 from the line (48.5 percent) in Big 12 action. "I like to pride myself on going to the line and making the free ones, and lately, it hasn't been happening."

Coach Jim Wooldridge said Hoskins' free-throw predicament isn't a reflection of his fundamentals.

It's merely a problem he needs to remedy himself, he said.

"I think he might have lost a little confidence when he goes to the line," Wooldridge said. "He just needs to work himself out of it. It starts with practice."

Freshman guard Shalee Lehning — who is 26-of-50 (52 percent) on the season — also has experienced an unnerving bout with the free-throw slump. In K-State's 71-70 loss to Texas in Austin, on Jan. 22, Lehning missed two clutch free throws with 7.5 seconds left, which could have potentially won the game for the Cats.

Three days later, Lehning was 4-for-8 from the line in K-State's win against Kansas on Jan. 25.

Coach Deb Patterson said she doesn't expect her young players to go to the line and knock them down every time. Like everything else, consistent free-throw shooting comes with experience, she said.

"If you're young, you're more inclined not to answer the call there," Patterson said. "It's inevitable — no matter what's your name, what your number is, if you've done it three or four times — you're more inclined to have experience in those situations and drop them down."

Junior guard Twiggy McIntyre said it's her responsibility as an upperclassman and someone who feels comfortable at the stripe to help the less-experienced players and remind them that missing free throws is part of the game.

"We've still got a long season ahead of us, and they've come so far," McIntyre said. "We're not going to let something, as far as a couple of free throws go, bring them down and or change their mentality about the game."

"If someone doesn't feel comfortable, one of the upperclassmen can maybe just go to the ball and demand it."

Adrienne Leslie-Toogood, assistant professor and psychologist coordinator of the curriculum for student services in the Department of Intercollegiate Athletics, said the free-throw slump can be fixed.

When approached by a basketball player, she identifies where the problem lies — either with their pre-shot routine or response when they go to the line — and then helps them to correct it.

"Basketball's an open sport, and free throws are one activity that is closed. I work with them (players) on a pre-shot routine, such as visualizing something or a breathing exercise," Leslie-Toogood said. "I also do 'what if?' scenarios — someone might notice if the game's really close or if someone's waving their arms in the background."

"When you know what throws you off, you can prepare a better respond. The more you do the routine and respond consistently, the better you will perform under those conditions."

Q. What NBA player did you try to emulate when you were growing up?
A. One of my favorites was Scottie Pippen. He was a bigger guard, and he did so many things – he defended, he played the point. He played a lot of positions like myself, so he is one of the players I definitely pattern my game after.

Q. Who is your favorite current NBA player?
A. Ray Allen (Seattle Supersonics).

Q. Since you grew up in Philadelphia, were you a 76ers fan?
A. Not really. I always wanted them to win, but I was a Chicago Bulls fan because I liked Scottie (Pippen).

Q. Who is the biggest jokester on your team?
A. There are a lot of them, but I'd have to say Curtis Allen, David Hoskins and Lance Harris.

Q. What was the last movie you saw?
A. "Glory Road." It was a really good movie – I knew the ending, of course, but it was good to see what those guys went through.

Q. Who do you think is the best player in the Big 12 Conference?
A. I like Daniel Gibson. He's a good shooter, and he is really confident out there. He doesn't force his shot, and he just plays hard. He is a really good guard.

Q. What is your favorite thing to do, besides play basketball?
A. Sleep. I think I go to sleep around 11 p.m., and I like to take naps during the day. If I'm not (at Bramlage) playing basketball, you might catch me sleeping.

Q. What is your favorite class you have taken at K-State?
A. Geography.

Q. What is your shoe size?
A. Thirteen.

K-State among Big 12 defensive leaders

Wildcats keeping opponents to lowest average scores since 1986-87 season

By Mark Potter
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Entering the 2005-06 K-State men's basketball season, Coach Jim Wooldridge was unsure what his team's primary strength would be.

After 17 games, he might have found an answer – defense.

Wooldridge's squad (12-5, 3-3) is on pace for K-State's lowest opponent scoring average (61.1 points) since the 1986-87 season, when the shot clock and three-point line were introduced.

So far, K-State has kept every opponent below its season scoring average. The Wildcats have limited 13 of their opponents to 65 points or less, and 11 of them have shot less than 40 percent from the field.

With K-State's 79-75 loss to Colorado on Saturday, the Buffaloes became the Wildcats' first foe to top 75 points in a regulation game.

Hustle and teamwork have contributed to K-State's defensive success, Wooldridge said.

"We have got some guys who are really working at it," Wooldridge said. "I think our players are beginning to understand we have to commit that kind of energy on the defensive end of the floor."

"It is really important for us to be a good defensive team, and I think our guys are starting to understand that. To succeed, we have to be the consummate team."

Wooldridge said the

"We were picked to finish 11th in our league, so I hope we play with a little chip on our shoulder. I think that can be part of our team identity – that we are playing a little bit mad. We are trying to prove people wrong, and there is nothing wrong with that."

Wildcats seem to be playing with attitude, which has helped them remain focused.

"We were picked to finish 11th in our league, so I hope we play with a little chip on our shoulder," Wooldridge said. "I think that can be part of our team identity – that we are playing a little bit mad. We are trying to prove people wrong, and there is nothing wrong with that."

In Big 12 Conference play, the Wildcats rank second in three-point field goal defense, third in field goal percentage defense, fourth in scoring defense and fifth in blocked shots and defensive rebounds.

K-State's defense was particularly stifling during its three-game conference winning streak against Kansas, Texas A&M and Missouri.

The Wildcats limited those three teams to an average of 57.7 points on 34.6 percent shooting – it was the first time since 1996 K-State had kept three-straight conference opponents to 65 points or less.

Junior guard Akeem

Wright was one Wildcat responsible for slowing down Kansas' Brandon Rush, Texas A&M's Acie Law, Missouri's Thomas Gardner, and most recently, Colorado's Richard Roby.

"There is somebody tough to guard almost every night," Wright said. "You've just got to be up for the challenge."

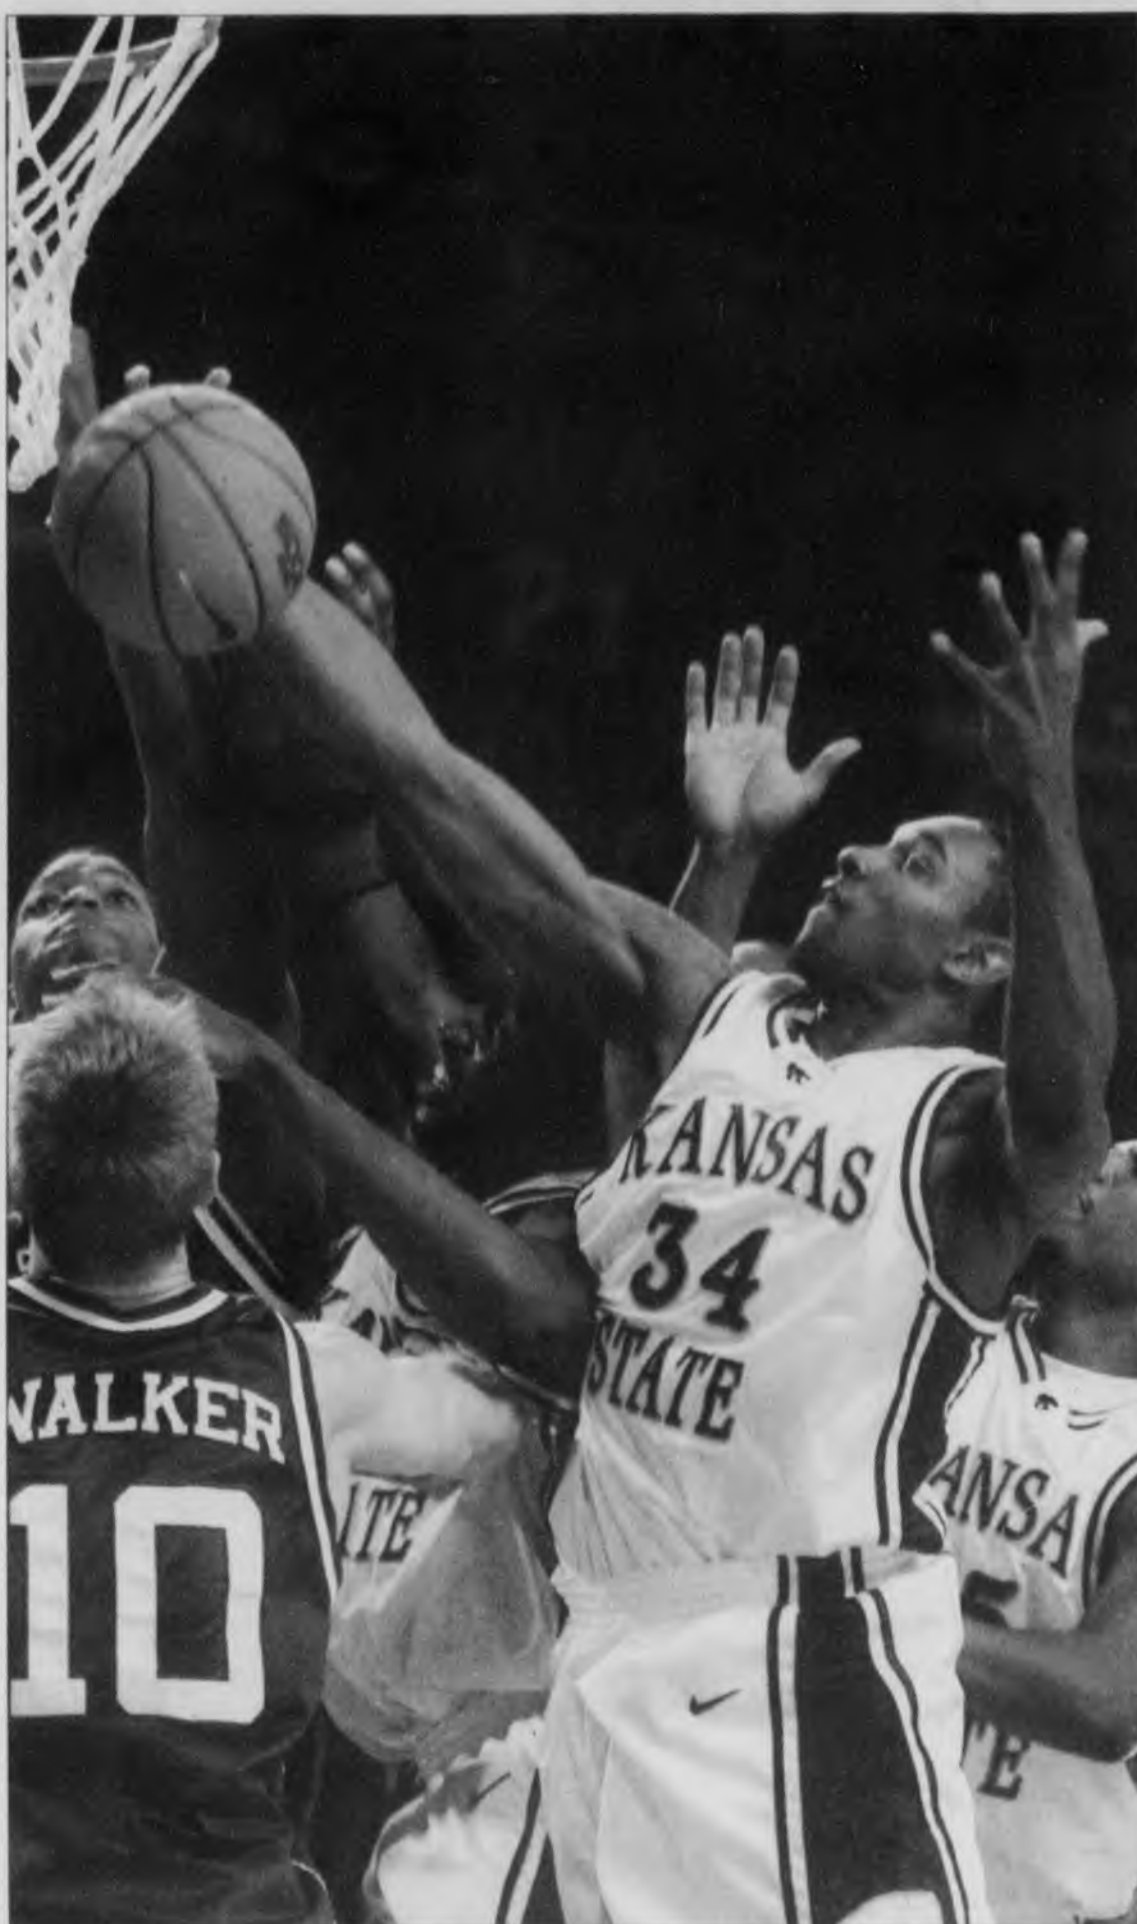

Wright said playing good defense has led to some easy baskets for K-State.

"We have a lot of athletes who can get up and down the court," Wright said. "That is what coach really emphasizes coming into games, and that leads to getting rebounds and getting out in transition."

Arguably one of K-State's best athletes, reserve guard Curtis Allen has served as a defensive specialist.

Allen said he uses his athleticism and quickness to his advantage while on defense.

"I'm very alert on defense," Allen said. "I try to focus on that more than my offensive game since coach told me my role is to come off the bench and bring energy."

Junior Akeem Wright pulls down a rebound during the second half against Texas A&M. Wright has emerged as one of K-State's top defenders.

Myers joins K-State

By Christina Hansen
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Former Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff Gen. Richard Myers is returning to his alma mater, K-State, as a Foundation professor of military history and leadership.

Myers FOUNDATION
PROFESSOR

President Jon Wefald announced Myers' new position last week during his introduction to President Bush's Landon Lecture. Myers was in attendance.

Charles Reagan, associate to Wefald, said Myers' duties as a Foundation professor will include giving guest lectures in military history and leadership courses and attending K-State Alumni Association and KSU foundation events.

Reagan also said Myers could help to identify future speakers for the university's numerous lecture series.

"He is the best known military official out there right now," he said. "It's great name recognition for the university."

Reagan said he worked for a long time to bring Myers to K-State and predicted the general would visit campus for three to four days several times throughout each semester.

Myers also will be actively involved in K-State's Institute for Military History and 20th

Turnpike toll hike possible

By Lacey D. Mackey
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

For K-State students who frequently drive on the turnpike to go home, a possible increase in tolls because of turnpike privatization would quickly deplete pocket change.

According to a Jan. 19 article in the Topeka Capital-Journal, the Kansas Turnpike Authority could receive up to $3.1 billion by leasing the turnpike to a private operator, likely increasing tolls for drivers.

KTA profit could also be as low as $300 million, due to toll prices and traffic, as reported by two investment banking firms.

Although the lease could quickly fill the pockets of the KTA, the proposal for privatization, presented by Citigroup and Goldman Sachs, has not been well-received by state legislators or Gov. Kathleen Sebelius.

Leah Smith, Kansas City, Mo., said an increase in tolls would heighten her frustration with the cost of travel.

Coach announces signing of 27 top players after quick recruiting period

By Michael Ashford
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

K-State football Coach Ron Prince announced Wednesday — the first day of the National Letter of Intent signing period — the signing of 27 players to his first recruiting class.

The 2006 class is made up of 16 high school signees and 10 junior college transfers, plus one grayshirt. The athletes in the class hail from 15 different states, and every offensive and defensive position is represented by at least one player.

"When we first came here, at the first press conference, we talked about wanting to build a team that was fast, strong, tough and disciplined, because that's the kind of team that helps you consistently compete for championships," Prince said. "We were looking for people who are achievement oriented and who are interested in going to college and earning their degree."

"The folks in this class represent that."

Prince and his staff only had about two months to complete K-State's 2006 recruiting class, as Prince was not hired until Dec. 5, and the full staff of assistant coaches was not complete until Jan. 3.

Prince credited assistant coaching hires Pat Washington, Mo. Latimore, Tim Tibesar and Tim McCarty for developing an early list of recruits K-State would seek.

"(They) did a terrific job of, in some cases or in many cases, cold-calling and really finding out and taking the temperature of the recruiting landscape to see what was out there," Prince said.

However, Prince said the final decision of who to recruit fell on his shoulders.

"The head coach is ultimately and supremely responsible for putting the team together," he said.

The headliner of the class is Josh Freeman, a quarterback from Kansas City, Mo., who is rated the No. 4 pro-style quarterback in the nation by recruiting service Rivals.com.

Freeman, who had offers from Colorado, Missouri, Nebraska, Texas A&M and Wisconsin, among others, originally committed to play at Nebraska. However, Freeman switched his commitment to K-State after Prince was hired.

Freeman, a mid-year high school graduate, is already on campus and will participate in spring practice.

"We were involved with Josh a little bit at Virginia," Prince said. "Every program in the country covets that ability."

"You have to have a young person who is not only a spatial thinker, but a sequential thinker as well. We felt that Josh was that type of quarterback."

K-State also secured commitment from three Kansas high school players — linebacker John Houlik, Wichita; offensive lineman Scott Krehbiel, Pratt, Kan.; and defensive tackle Trevor Viers, Windom, Kan.

"This whole idea of the in-state player, it's really important," Prince said. "Being a young person who came from the state, I'm sensitive to it."

During the 17 years Bill Snyder coached K-State, the university routinely landed some of the nation's top junior college players, with the likes of Jeff Kelly, Darnell McDonald, Tank Reese and Michael Bishop.

Prince said he believed K-State

Gubernatorial candidate outlines platform on school finance

By Logan C. Adams
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Republican candidate for Kansas governor Robin Jennison was in Manhattan Wednesday.

Jennison spoke briefly to three people beneath a tree on the west side of the Riley County Courthouse on his tour of several Kansas cities to officially announce his candidacy.

The candidate is a former state representative from Healy, Kan. He was speaker of the Kansas House of Representatives in 1999 and 2000.

Jennison presented the three main tenants of his platform, the most important of which he said was school finance.

"I think last year was a prime example of the current governor's unwillingness to make some of those tough decisions when we dealt with school finance," he said.

Jennison was referring to when the Supreme Court ruled that Kansas needs to spend more on education and forced the Kansas Legislature into a special session. This went hand-in-hand with his second point, judicial restraint.

"She sent it straight away to the Supreme Court ... begging them to weigh in on school finance," he said. "I think the Supreme Court overstepped its bounds."

Jennison said he did not want to raise taxes to pay for education, saying the solution to solving school finance lies in the third key piece of his platform, improving the state's economy.

He said raising taxes would harm businesses in the state and, taking a page from the playbook of former Republican President Ronald Reagan, said the key to raising revenue is keeping taxes down so the economy grows.

Jennison said he also wants to see a separation of the State Department of Wildlife and Parks into two departments, one for wildlife and one for parks. He also said he wants to see a large increase in out-of-state marketing of Kansas tourist destinations.

Adam Stilley, a member of the campaign's touring staff, said Jennison will be making stops in the following Kansas cities in the next two days: Dodge City, Great Bend, Liberal, Hays, Colby and Goodland.

Ron Wilson, director of the Huck Boyd Institute for Rural Development, was in the audience. Wilson said Jennison was once chairman of Wilson's board of directors and said he would have no trouble supporting Jennison.

"It's clear just hearing him speak to the issues that he has ideas and plans for dealing with the key issues," he said.

Actress focuses on hope

By Megan Molitor
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The booming voice of Kimberly C. Ellis rang through the K-State Student Union's Forum Hall Wednesday night.

As the first performer for K-State's celebration of Black History Month, Ellis, stage name Dr. Goddess, delivered a variety show.

The show was described as being a coming-of-age, multimedia one-woman show depicting the life of a young African-American woman growing up in urban America. Ellis used monologues, poetry, music, dance and sketch comedy to present her message.

Her message was one of reform and hope for all people. Ellis used humor to make the point that social problems do exist, but instead of ignoring them, she encouraged audience members to change them.

"Don't be in denial about sexism and racism; they do exist," Ellis said. "Instead, accept them, embrace them, then try and change them. We all have a responsibility to our individual cultures, but we can't ignore the others as well."

A screen came up to project the statement: "#1 cause of death in pregnant women in the United States is homicide, and black women are the most affected."

Then scenes showed the respect and recognition all single parents deserve.

Ellis said students need to listen to the words in their music and movies. She said, in a freestyle rap song, "Phat Beat," there is too much violence and too many derogatory comments.

"I've always been a cut-up and dramatic," Ellis said about why she decided to do the show. "Through my conversations with my students, I knew that we had to take a closer look at what we were listening to."

"Don't get me wrong, I'm always the last person to leave the library during the week, but the last to leave a party on the weekend. But it isn't just a song or a movie. We need to address the situation, but we can do it a fun manner."

The audience was enthusiastic and responsive.

"The program covered a lot of dynamics of society and the life of a minority," Antwoine Shaaf, senior in kinesiology, said. "It was real life and modern. It really gave a good twist to the life of a young black woman."

Aressa Wilson, visiting Manhattan from Oklahoma with her mother, agreed.

"It's my first time seeing the show, and I really liked it, especially the poetry," Wilson said. "It meant a lot, especially the 'Phat Beat' skit. Kids need to listen to their music more."

Ellis grew up in Pittsburgh, Pa., and has a doctorate in American studies with an emphasis in African-American literature and history.

K-State faculty petition USD 383 to not support science redefinition

By Kaley Lyon
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

One hundred fifty-seven staff and faculty members from K-State science departments endorsed and presented a resolution to the USD 383 Manhattan-Ogden Board of Education at Wednesday's school board meeting.

This proposal asked board members not to support the redefinition of science included in the standards passed by the Kansas State Board of Education on Nov. 8, 2005, by continuing to implement the science curriculum that was established on March 9, 2005.

"That's what science is," John Staver, professor of education, said.

"It's a very powerful and useful way of knowing that uses natural explanations to explain natural phenomenon."

The science standards passed on Nov. 8, 2005, changed the definition of science to allow non-natural (including supernatural) explanations of natural phenomena.

The main scientific theory targeted by these standards is Darwinian evolution.

"We think this is unfair, and there might be ulterior motives involved," Mike Herman, associate professor of biology, said.

The resolution included five concerns regarding classroom implementation of such standards and said the quality of science education in USD 383 would diminish, putting local children at a disadvantage compared to their peers in other states.

The resolution also said this issue has created negative publicity, which threatens K-State as well as local business efforts to recruit and retain highly qualified professionals.

K-State's Division of Biology is hiring three more professors. The department has been in discussion with eight candidates, and during each conversation, the issue of evolution versus intelligent design has come up, Herman said.

The department is concerned that this issue might make it difficult to attract high-quality educators.

The fourth concern cited in the resolution is that U.S. students are falling behind world-wide norms, as measured by achievement, and implementation of such standards could widen this gap.

Finally, the resolution stated that the changes made to the standards are based on the false belief that evolutionary science, and the scientific method itself, is based on an atheistic philosophy.

In addition to the resolution presented on behalf of K-State science departments, board members also received a letter from Nobel Laureate H. Robert Horvitz. Horvitz is a professor of biology at Massachusetts Institute of Technology and received the 2002 Nobel Prize in Physiology or Medicine.

In September 2005, Horvitz and 38 other Nobel Laureates wrote the Kansas State Board of Education in defense of science and education, urging members to reject the proposed standards.

"As we stated then, evolution is not a theory, as the term 'theory of evolution' seems to indicate, but rather is based upon compelling scientific evidence and is the foundation of much modern biology," Horvitz said in the letter.

Though the state standards of science education have changed, school districts can determine the curriculum within the district, USD 383 Superintendent Bob Shannon said.

However, as of spring 2008, state assessments will be based on the accepted state standards, though this is subject to change.

The State Board of Education is considering using a science reasoning test given by ACT at the high school level and also is considering tests developed at the University of Kansas. However no decision has been made, Staver said.

The USD 383 Board of Education will likely involve district educators and administration in this issue, and if board members decide change is needed, they will come forward, Board President Randy Martin said. It also might be decided not to take a position on this issue.

"There are not many communities in Kansas that could have this much weight behind the opinions, so it is something we'll take very seriously," Martin said. "We need to make sure we don't close our minds to simple answers to complex issues."

New office park site piques renters' interest

Building's progressive design, location attract attention in last construction phases

By Michael Ashford
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Interested apartment renters began calling Lisa Knight, a local real estate broker, as soon as construction began at the site of her latest project, a complex at 2505 Anderson Ave., several months ago.

Normally, it would be a real estate agent's dream.

There is just one problem.

The complex isn't an apartment building; it's an office park.

"We wanted some character," said Knight, one of the owners of the building and Knight Real Estate, Inc., broker. "We just didn't want to build a box, and I think that does catch people's eyes because they look at it, and people know where the building is."

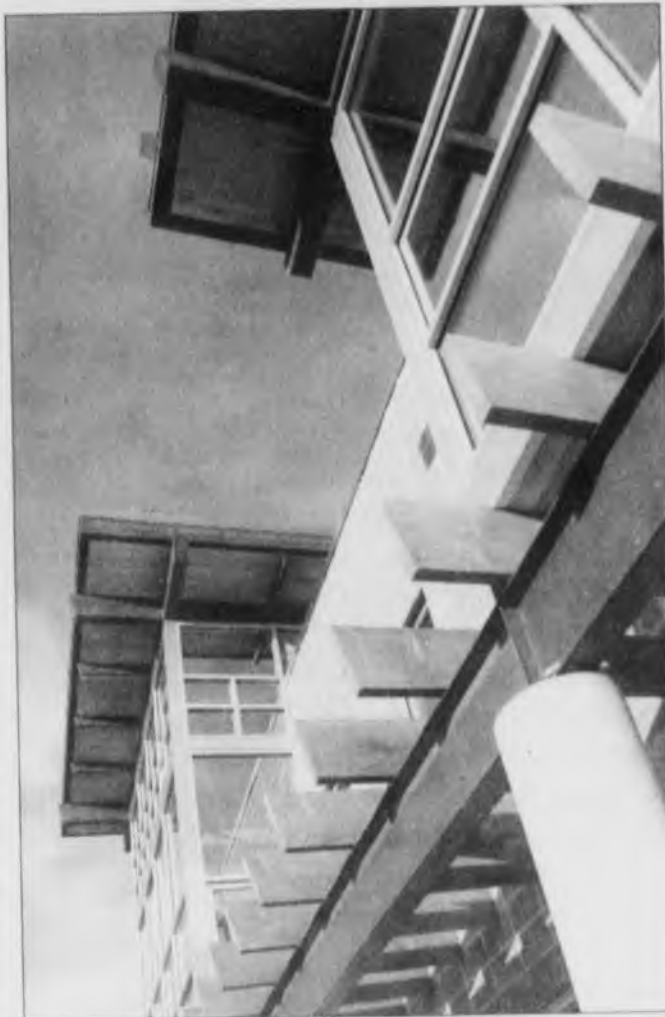

So what attracted so many apartment buyers to an office park?

The complex's architect, and Lisa Knight's husband, Dan, said the building's design, which is a look that has taken hold in other areas of the country, played a role in the increased attention.

"We envisioned a small street-scape building where each individual unit has its own unique look," Dan Knight said. "It's a trend you see in other, more progressive areas. Manhattan is somewhat progressive, but you'll see that look on the East and West Coasts, in Colorado and some of these areas where there's a lot more competition with buildings."

The site is only now being developed because of several restrictions that made construction difficult.

Eric Cattell, Manhattan's assistant director for planning, said the site contained drainage and utility easements that had deterred developers

"It's an area that had been zoned for offices for awhile," Cattell said. "It was just a matter of the property owner trying to sell it to somebody that was willing to put the money into it to make the site work."

With construction in the final phases, interest has not waned much since it was made known the complex is for offices and not apartment dwellers, Lisa Knight said.

Dan Knight and his business partner, Tracy Anderson, will move their offices, Anderson Knight Architects, into the building along with an insurance company and a mortgage firm.

"I think the location is high in demand because it's so convenient," Lisa Knight said. "The fact that it's new - people like new buildings - and office space is limited in this town."

TO THE POINT Turnpike change needs further consideration

According to an article in the Topeka Capital-Journal, the Kansas Turnpike Authority is considering the privatization of its turnpike.

KTA could receive up to $3.1 billion if it leased the turnpike to private operators.

The banking firms Citigroup and Goldman Sachs both have submitted proposals to KTA for privatization, which would increase tolls for drivers.

While KTA would reap the financial benefits of privatization, the decision would not favor K-State students.

A large percentage of K-State students are from the Johnson County area or out of state.

An increased toll would prevent them from going home as often on the weekends.

Also, students who fly out of Kansas City International Airport would be less apt to fly home.

Students would also think twice before visiting friends at the University of Kansas or going to a concert at Verizon Wireless Amphitheater.

So far, the proposals for privatization have not been well-received by Gov. Kathleen Sebelius or the Kansas Legislature.

KTA should consider all of the positive and negative effects before further pursuing the privatization of the turnpike.

To the point is an editorial selected and debated by the editorial board and written after a majority opinion is formed. This is the Collegian's official opinion.

Eminent Domain

Seizing private property for public good is unfair to land owners

Back in high school I bought a tape converter, allowing me to play both my CDs through the Kraco speaker in my '81 GMC. With a schizophrenic mix of 1999 Grammy Rap Nominees and Chris Ledoux's 20 Greatest Hits, I terrorized the countryside at 6,000 RPMs to a buzzing beat.

The converter disappeared one day, and I soon discovered sister Kara had commandeered it for use in her '83 Olds. She refused to return it, and I took the case to Judge Mama, who inexplicably denied any motion to send Kara to live with the Cosbys to allow recovery of my device.

Upon an attempted physical confrontation, I was dealt a stiff right jab to the jaw. Further assaults proved futile.

Eminent domain finds root in the 5th Amendment to our Constitution.

The exact wording reads "... nor shall private property be taken for public use, without just compensation."

The topic of eminent domain and consequences thereof crashed to the forefront of discussion on June 23, 2005, when the Supreme Court ruled in favor of the City of New London, Conn., in a landmark case involving forced transfer of private property.

In short, the justices greatly widened the scope of the phrase "public use" to include economic benefit to a community through individuals. Basically, the taking of private property in exchange for just compensation to make way for corporate offices and major chain shops and restaurants was justified by the amount of proposed revenue increases and job opportunities.

Economic despair in New London and an intensive benefit study by the City Council played a large part in the outcome.

Kansas, with hundreds of thousands of "undeveloped" acres, stands directly in the path of the eminent domain tornado.

Terry Holdren, local director of Kansas Farm Bureau's government relations, stated this weekend, "Kansas is the third worst state in the country (in terms of eminent domain abuses)."

In fact, negotiations continue in regard to a proposed 8,000-acre recreation lake south of Wichita that would make my roommate's farm home near Winfield, Kan., instant beachfront property.

Having suffered through the aftermath of the abuses of eminent domain, I feel compelled to encourage preservation of property rights and ownership.

Private property – my tape converter – was taken from one individual – me – and given to another individual – Kara – to be used for private gain – laying down a beat in the Olds – in exchange for just compensation – a sore jaw.

Clearly, this is unconstitutional, but the generalities mirror Kelo v. New London.

My case, had it been argued before the Supreme Court with the same basic defense, the ruling would have favored Kara based on the following manure.

"Although the transfer of private property occurred between two private parties and will remain private property, we argue in Kara's defense as per the 'public use' phrase in the Constitution, interpreting aforesaid phrase to also defend 'increased public benefit.' Music played in both vehicles can be reasonably defined as a 'public use' because nearly anyone, a.k.a. 'the public,' can ride in and thereby listen to either stereo.

"Our argument finds grounds in the following: Lucas' pickup sports one blown speaker and his CD collection is miniscule, while the Brougham boasts an AC Delco system with five medium-grade speakers and CDs ranging from Aerosmith to Toby Keith. Based on public benefit from such a monumental increase in both volume and selection, we implore the court find in favor of Kara."

Damn logic.

Stronger laws necessary to protect animals

I still remember the kitten. It was a tiny thing, about four pounds and full of life. It was brought to the vet clinic, where I worked, with a broken pelvis, which the veterinarian said was caused either by being dropped, kicked or hit by a car. He took x-rays, then kept it on cage rest for a few days.

He sent it home with instructions to keep its activity limited.

About three days later, the kitten was back and no longer full of life.

It was hemiplegic on the right side and in so much pain it screamed whenever it was touched.

Hemiplegic, according to the Merriam-Webster dictionary, is defined as "total or partial paralysis of one side of the body that results from disease or injury to the motor centers of the brain."

The man who brought the kitten in said it had clawed him, and he kicked it.

This man had a girlfriend, and his girlfriend had a daughter. I remember wondering if he could do that to a kitten, what would he do to these women?

Senate Bill 135, commonly known as Scruffy's Law, would make torturing animals a felony, instead of a misdemeanor.

The problem is that there are two competing Senate bills and one House bill being considered in the Kansas Legislature this session.

The common name of this law originated from Scruffy, a Yorkshire terrier, who was tortured and killed by Jose Gutierrez, Marcus Rodriguez, Richard Golubski and Lance Arsenault in 1997 in Wyandotte County.

The 6-pound dog was shot with a pellet gun, then placed alive in a bag, set on fire and beaten with a shovel, while the four videotaped the event.

This was a 6-pound dog. Just a little thing. A tiny bit of fluff and bone that couldn't have possibly done any serious harm to anyone, even if it had tried.

So Sen. David Haley, D-4th District, began an almost 10-year crusade to change Kansas law and make sure people like these are punished.

Haley's bill will make "intentionally killing, maiming, torturing, burning or mutilating or causing serious physical injury to any animal" a felony in Kansas.

The bill was defeated again and again, and some senators went so far as to bark at Sen. Haley when he presented it.

The law remains the same, still a misdemeanor, with a punishment of a year in jail and a $2,500 fine.

The bill has been defeated by linking it to other, unrelated issues, yet Haley keeps presenting it.

Now, Senate Bill 408 has been introduced in the Kansas Senate, and House Bill 2424 – Magnum's Law – has been introduced in the Kansas House of Representatives.

It's great that people are suddenly concerned, but with three bills winding their way through the Legislature, chances are good that none will get passed. With all the voices clamoring to be heard, none will.

The Legislature is being given an easy out in this case. Legislators can just say there were too many conflicting views, that the two Senate bills and one House bill were too much for their poor little minds to take, and they divided on them.

Make the Legislature stand up and take responsibility. In the words of Mohandas K. Gandhi, "The greatness of a nation can be judged by how it treats its animals."

AME church provides comfort to members

By Sheila Ellis
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Bethel AME Church, 401 Yuma St., is different from other churches in Manhattan.

The church was the first black church in Manhattan, and it was started by former slaves.

James Butler, the oldest member of Bethel AME, said churches served as a refuge during slavery when other institutions closed their doors to blacks.

"The black church is an anchor of life for black people," Butler said.

The AME church was established in 1787 by Richard Allen and Absalom Jones in Philadelphia, according to its Web site. AME stands for African Methodist Episcopal. After Kansas became a free state, many former slaves migrated to the Midwest where they formed black churches such as Bethel AME, the Rev. Penny Pitchford, pastor of Bethel AME, said.

"If you look at the history of Manhattan, you will see it has been here for 150 years, and Bethel has been here for 127 years in November," she said.

Pitchford said slaves expressed themselves through songs when they were introduced to Christianity.

"Church allowed slaves to let go of the daily mundane of things in life, by mixing worship with African songs and dance," she said.

Pitchford said Bethel AME provides motivation for blacks who still encounter racism.

Suggestion for rational abortion talks unbelievable

Editor,

I found it ironic that Attorney General Phill Kline was cited in your Jan. 26 editorial as the person suggesting a need for rational discussion of abortion. Kline is the one who, about a year ago, pushed his anti-abortion extremism to demand the personal medical records of Kansas women who have had abortions. His staunch opposition of abortion makes rational discussion with him impossible. And recently his wife applauded anti-abortion advocates (protesters) in Topeka. Those "advocates" are some of the people who are not interested in rational discussion.

Rational discussion would be nice. It might lead the pro-life group to realize that abortions happen regardless of their legality. Before Roe v. Wade, abortions happened just as frequently as they do now. The only difference is that before the ruling they were back alley abortions that often killed the mother in the process. After the ruling, abortions became safe for the mother because they are done in a sterilized clinic. If abortions, which I will admit are horrible, are going to occur no matter what, wouldn't it be rational to have them occur in a safe environment, regardless of your philosophical opinions on the issue?

Alito makes excellent addition to Supreme Court

Editor,

Samuel Alito, a federal appeals judge, was just confirmed to replace retiring Justice Sandra Day O'Connor. He hails from New Jersey and is a second-generation Italian American. He earned his Bachelor's degree in history at Princeton where classmates remembered his brilliance and dry wit. Alito wrote a senior thesis on the Italian Supreme Court and joked in the yearbook that he hoped to "one day warm a seat on the Supreme Court." He earned his law degree at Yale and clerked for a Third Circuit judge (and future colleague). A career public servant, Alito argued 12 Supreme Court cases and excelled as a federal prosecutor before being appointed to the Third Circuit, where he has served for 15 years. Alito is the ninth Princeton graduate and the only Third Circuit judge to serve on the Supreme Court.

Justice Alito is a quiet, brilliant conservative, who is well prepared for oral argument and a fast writer (according to legend, he once wrote a death penalty decision in 30 minutes). As a young Reagan Administration lawyer, Alito wrote a memo outlining a strategy to curb Roe v. Wade and later dissented in Planned Parenthood v. Casey, the landmark case where the Supreme Court partially affirmed Roe's limited right to abortion. Alito understands religious freedom and the Constitution's protection of religious liberty.

Alito and his wife, a former law librarian, have a son and daughter. Justice Alito will be an excellent Justice on the Roberts Court.

Parents to blame for buying violent games for children

Editor,

Thank God someone addressed this in the media, because I'm tired of feeling hopeless against politicians' ignorant war on video games.

Not sure if Zach has read any of the studies done by Dr. Craig Anderson at Iowa State, but they're very interesting reads. Unfortunately, a lot of his work gets quoted by politicians trying to build a case against violence in video games. As with most other studies, though, Dr. Anderson's research only shows that violence in media heightens one's level of aggression. There has been no research to show a causal relationship between media violence and instances of violent activity.

But psychology aside, there's no reason why the government should be playing big brother. That's what our parents are for. The ESRB has gone above and beyond in establishing a rating system and trying to educate consumers. What's more, most of the kids who get their hands on these "mature" games aren't buying them on their own; their folks are ponying up the dough.

The gaming industry has a system of checks in place and are supervising themselves quite well. Parents should be aware of what they're buying before they open their wallet, and retail stores should be keeping themselves in check in regards to the sale of restricted products to minors. They already do it for tobacco, alcohol, and firearms.

All the ID checks in the world won't stop a child from getting a questionably appropriate video game while their parent is shelling out for a product they know nothing about.

Department needs to excuse absences for Bush lecture

Editor,

I completely disagree with the faculty of the Department of Modern Languages, specifically Spanish Coordinator Angélique Courbou, for their position of handing out unexcused absences to Spanish students, of which I am one, who attended the Landon Lecture presented by President Bush on Jan. 23 ("Professors vary on class cancellation policies for Bush lecture" 1/20/06). Why is the Spanish coordinator so determined to penalize the efforts of students who desire to expand and diversify their educational horizons? Does Ms. Courbou not understand, as Provost Nellis put it, "the learning potential of such a unique event?"

The Landon Lecture Series is a staple of K-State to bring nationally and internationally known men and women to our campus for the purpose of discussing relevant topics in our world. Currently, no one in the world is more recognized than President George W. Bush, and yet the faculty is set on impeding their students' university-sponsored, tuition-paid educational event.

I thought this is why we attend a university - to be a part of these once-in-a-lifetime opportunities that diversify our educational experiences.

I simply ask the faculty of the Department of Modern Languages exercise common sense in the application of their attendance policies and excuse any student who chose to attend this prestigious and momentous educational lecture.

Collegian shows lack of taste for publishing letter to editor

Editor,

I write this letter in regard to the editorial, written by Lindsay Ruddick, published in the Jan. 26 edition of the Collegian. I think it showed unbelievable taste and lack of appreciation by the Collegian and Lindsay for her editorial to be published. I realize the paper has a choice of which editorials to publish and which to leave out, but at least be selective and only publish articles that have fact-based criticism.

Lindsay claims to be an "avid" K-State fan but she clearly does not know much about K-State athletics. The players that she was referring to were high school football recruits on an official visit to K-State.

As for head Coach Ron

Prince, how shameful for a member of the student body to criticize his kindness.

Be careful about which articles you publish because it makes the paper and the author look foolish. This is not the kind of publicity we as a university need to be giving to our athletic programs, especially the football program. The success of our university has a lot to do with the success of our football program. Just look at enrollment and private donation numbers. They have risen alongside the success of our football program, and I hope they continue to do so, but publishing articles like Lindsay's do not help our cause.

Scott Grier | Senior in political science and history

Prince acted appropriately at basketball game last week

Editor,

The way Coach Prince and the recruits acted at the game was in fact appropriate. By having the recruits come in from the tunnel in the middle of the basketball game last Saturday was a great recruiting strategy.

The person who voiced his opinion in the Thursday edition of the newspaper doesn't know much about recruiting.

It would be pointless and downright stupid to have the recruits come in during warm-ups when Bramlage is mostly empty.

By having the recruits come in the middle of the game when the "Fred" is rocking is the way to go.

The entire student section went nuts and greeted Coach Prince with great enthusiasm that sent a message to the recruits that the entire student body was behind them 100 percent.

I am sure that made a great impression with the recruits and Coach Prince.

Not only did Coach take time to walk up and down the student section to greet people, he took time to take pictures with the students.

I was proud of the effort of both the men's basketball team and Coach Prince.

Missouri overcomes 19-point halftime deficit to win

By Matthew Girard
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

K-State was 3.6 seconds from moving into sole possession of second place in the Big 12 Conference standings and bumping Missouri into third, but the Tigers had other plans Wednesday at Bramlage Coliseum.

Missouri senior LaToya Bond bounced in a 12-foot jump shot with just seconds left in overtime to give the Tigers (16-4, 6-2) the 65-66 win against the Wildcats (15-5, 5-4).

"I was just looking at attacking basket and get the foul or an easy bucket, and I just threw it up, and it went in," Bond said.

K-State had taken a 65-64 lead on sophomore Kimberly Dietz's two made free throws with 20 seconds left in overtime, before Bond won the game for the Tigers.

In the first half, it looked as if the Wildcats would avenge their 68-42 loss to Missouri earlier in the season by opening the game with a 24-to-7 run.

K-State would extend the lead to 35-16 at the break behind its defense, which held Missouri to its lowest first-half point total of the season. Bond, who was eighth in the conference in scoring (17.3 points per game) coming into the game, was held to just one point in the first half.

"She had two fouls, and she has not played well with two fouls," Missouri coach Cindy Stein said. "We wanted 'Toya fresh in the second half."

In the second half, Bond caught fire, scoring 20 points

2nd-half struggle defines game for Wildcats

By Matt Gorney
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The women's basketball game Wednesday night can be defined in three pieces: the first minute, the last minute and overtime.

THE FIRST MINUTE

It was in the first minute of the game that K-State went on a 7-0 run against the Tigers.

All five Wildcat starters had a part in that first minute of play. Junior Twiggy McIntyre hit a 3-pointer to start things off on an assist from freshman Shalee Lehning. A quick offensive rebound by Lehning helped set up a jumper from freshman JoAnn Hamlin on an assist from freshman Marlies Gipson.

A steal and assist by McIntyre allowed a layup from junior Claire Coggins.

Seven points scored in 57 seconds.

By the end of the first 20 minutes of play, the Wildcats had scored 35 points, kept Missouri to only 16 points and, at one point, held the Tigers scoreless for five minutes and 40 seconds.

"It's a positive thing that we can get a great team like Missouri down by so much that we can come out hard, and we can come out on first and play real hard," Coggins said. "It's just the learning curve, and the learning aspect of the game where we need to learn how to keep it and learn how to fight each possession to keep it."

THE FINAL MINUTE

When the words "one minute" rang through the Bramlage Coliseum public address system, the utter elation that had accompanied the end of the first half had been transformed into utter despair.

That 19-point halftime lead vanished as the Tigers climbed their way back to tie the game at 57 points.

"We've executed very well on the front end of a basketball game, sometimes for as long as 15 or 20 minutes," Coach Deb Patterson said. "It certainly is disappointing when you see a lead chipped away, but it's just the progress of growing. Probably more so than anything, we've got to grow in learning how to bring consistency individually."

Although the actual final minute was scoreless, the damage already had been done.

Of the Cats' 22 second-half points, 14 were scored by Hamlin. However, Missouri's LaToya Bond notched 18 of her game-total 31 points in the second half.

"We just were out there competing in the game each possession, and we're not going to sit here and look in the past and what has happened then," Lehning said. "It's just one of those things where we lost focus and our intensity, and we've got to work on that."

OVERTIME

Missouri never led the game during regulation.

Behind second-half play, the Tigers were able to buy themselves some extra time to decide the contest.

The tip and the overtime were controlled by Missouri. K-State went down by five points but tied and took the lead on two free throws from sophomore Kimberly Dietz with 15 seconds remaining.

On the inbound, Missouri's Bond went down the court and drained a jumper, making the score 65-66, Tigers, to seal the game.

"I'm proud that we did force the game into overtime, and we weren't necessarily competing well, and it really comes down to a big-time play-maker making a big-time shot to win the basketball game," Patterson said. "All things considered, I think we made a real run at that basketball game and didn't necessarily play as well as we're capable of playing."

Baylor upsets K-State, ends 20-game losing streak

By Mark Potter
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Baylor upset the K-State men's basketball team 72-70 Wednesday night en route to snapping a 20-game losing streak.

The Bears (1-6, 1-6) needed overtime to fend off the Wildcats (12-6, 3-4), who have lost five of six road games this season.

"We just have ourselves to blame," Coach Jim Wooldridge said. "We're not a good road team, and we haven't been a good road team. Sooner or later, you have got to break through."

After compiling a three-game winning streak, K-State has now lost two-straight contests, dropping the Wildcats into a three-way tie for sixth in the Big 12 Conference.

K-State point guard Clint Stewart did his best to prevent the loss, finishing with a career-high 19 points on 6-of-8 shooting.

Stewart also made a career-high five 3-pointers, including one that gave the Wildcats a 60-58 lead with less than three minutes left in regulation.

K-State had its chances to win the game, but Wooldridge's squad misfired on two potential game-winning shots.

Junior forward Cartier Martin, who finished with 15 points, missed a tough fade-away jumper at the end of regulation, which sent the game into overtime.

"We wanted to get the ball to Cartier or Lance (Harris)," Wooldridge said. "Lance was wide open in the lane, and that was too bad we couldn't get it to him."

Then, with less than 10 seconds left in overtime and K-State trailing by two points, junior guard Lance Harris attempted a 3-pointer, but it rattled out.

K-State grabbed the loose ball, and Martin shot an air ball at the buzzer, which would have sent the game to a second overtime.

Baylor, which has only played seven games as a result of NCAA violations, won 72-70.

Wooldridge said his team blew crucial opportunities to win the game.

WNBA | Mahoney signs with Connecticut Sun

The Connecticut Sun announced Wednesday it has signed Megan Mahoney and Candace Futrell to contracts. Per team policy, no terms were released.

Mahoney was drafted in the third round (34th overall) of the 2005 WNBA Draft out of K-State. She missed all of last season rehabilitating a ruptured Achilles tendon and is currently playing in Iceland in preparation for her first season with Connecticut. She was signed to a rookie contract, a three-year deal with the team holding an option for a fourth season.

Wednesday was the first day WNBA teams could sign free agents. The Sun expect to announce more signings in the coming weeks.

BKC | Men's game against Oklahoma State sold out

K-State athletics officials announced Wednesday that all tickets for the Feb. 4 men's game against Oklahoma State have been sold. Tip-off for Saturday's game is scheduled for 3 p.m. in Bramlage Coliseum.

The game against Oklahoma State is the first sell-out against a team other than Kansas since Jan. 11, 2003, when the Wildcats beat Texas Tech 68-44.

MLB | Kentucky Derby takes a sponsor, first time

LOUISVILLE, Ky. — The Kentucky Derby will have a sponsor for the first time, striking a five-year deal with a fast-food restaurant company that owns KFC, Taco Bell and Pizza Hut.

Yum Brands Inc., based in Louisville, becomes the first named sponsor of the Derby at Churchill Downs, and the race will be referred to as the Kentucky Derby, presented by Yum Brands, it was announced Wednesday.

The Yum logo will appear under the famed twin spires for the Derby on May 6 and will also be shown on a sign above the starting gate, on the jackets of the pony riders who escort the horses during the post parade, on television billboards and elsewhere around the track.

NFL | Waters agrees to deal with Chiefs

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — Offensive lineman Brian Waters agreed to a six-year extension of his contract with the Kansas City Chiefs late last season, president and general manager Carl Peterson said Tuesday.

Waters, a left guard, has made the Pro Bowl the last two seasons.

Peterson told The Kansas City Star that Waters, who had fired his agent about a year ago, reached the agreement on his own in November. Terms were not disclosed.

NFL | Porter bothered by Seahawk remarks

PONTIAC, Mich. — Steelers linebacker Joey Porter said nothing derogatory about the Seahawks.

That changed Wednesday after Seattle tight end Jeramy Stevens effectively guaranteed a victory.

Porter said Stevens' remarks were all he needed to get him going for the Super Bowl.

Porter was agitated about Stevens' comments Tuesday regarding Steelers star Jerome Bettis' much-publicized return to his hometown of Detroit to try to win a Super Bowl in what likely is his final season.

Black history in the Old West

Cole Minton, freshman in English, looks at art by Mitchell Pearson in the William T. Kemper Art Gallery Tuesday afternoon. Pearson's art will be on display until Feb. 10.

Artwork depicts contributions of cowboys, rodeos

KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

During Black History Month students can check out K-State Student Union's William T. Kemper Art Gallery to view Mitchell Pearson's exhibit, "Black Cowboys and Black Rodeos."

"It is important to know your history," said Pearson, a Lawrence-based artist and sixth-grade school teacher.

The students on Union Program Council picked the artwork to honor Black History Month, said Beth Bailey, assistant director of the Union.

"We decided to pick Mitchell Pearson's art because his son Joel Oliver Pearson came to us with the idea, and after we viewed his work we were impressed," said Kurt Fenster, co-chair of UPC and junior in theater.

Many of the pieces in the gallery depict black history in a new light, showcasing a part of black history is not discussed very often, black cowboys, Pearson said.

The color scheme used in his work is complementary to the history of black cowboys, Pearson said. He incorporated many shades of brown, like amber and sienna, because he said it reminded him of childhood memories from the saddle club and rodeos.

"My artwork connects with black history in a lot of ways," he said. "Black history is a big part of American history."

During the cowboy era, most cowboys were represented as white, he said.

"The contributions of black cowboys are phenomenal," He said. "Unfortunately the black cowboy chapter of history is very faded."

One of Pearson's pieces, "Nat Wood," is dedicated to cowboy legend Deadwood Dick. According to its description, Deadwood was legendary among the history of the west.

His nickname was gained from winning a contest in Deadwood, S.D., that involved shooting a pistol and a rifle, roping, saddling and riding a wild bronco.

The exhibit also features two pieces of work, "Stormin' Norman Brown" and "Al Jarreau," which are works in progress as a part of Pearson's Jazz series.

"Pearson thought it would be interesting to see how an artist go about doing his work and to see the progress and process of the work," Bailey said.

"Black Cowboys and Black Rodeos" will be on display until Feb. 10.

"I like all the pieces. They really capture the African-American culture," Kendra Spencer, senior in sociology, said.

'Annapolis' fails to show scope of Naval Academy

"Annapolis"

Movie review by Brendan Praeger

"Annapolis," the new film from director Justin Lin, leads the competition for worst movie of the year due to its crippling unoriginality.

The film follows Jake Huard (James Franco) through his freshman year at the U.S. Naval Academy in Annapolis, Md. He has to overcome his un-supportive family and peers as well as his inadequacies to succeed in becoming a naval officer.

The plot isn't anything new, but the Annapolis campus should have provided some scenery.

Unfortunately, Annapolis wanted nothing to do with this movie.

As a result, it looks like it was filmed at a junior college. Most scenes are either indoors or at an obstacle course.

The cast also is surprisingly small.

An officer reveals that 1,200 people are accepted to Annapolis each year, but we never see more than 30 people onscreen at one time.

The curriculum the students are taught is also questionable.

In real life, cadets have an enormous amount of homework.

The movie makes it seem as if boxing and naval trivia are the most important subjects.

The boxing scenes provide some of the film's best moments. The director probably should have scrapped the Annapolis story and simply remade Rocky.

The actors do a decent job considering the poor material. The best performance comes from Vicellous Reon Shannon, who plays Huard's overweight roommate from rural Arkansas.

He is the only character with genuine like-ability, and his speech about Mississippi's inferiority is the most entertaining moment in the movie.

"Annapolis" doesn't offer anything to justify the price of a movie ticket. It offers nothing original and never reaches an adequate level of entertainment.

Spears to Guest Star on 'Will & Grace'

Britney Spears will guest star on an episode of "Will & Grace," NBC announced Tuesday.

The pop star will appear as a conservative Christian sidekick to Sean Hayes' character, Jack, who hosts his own talk show, on the April 13 episode, the network said.

Jack's fictional network, Out TV, is bought by a Christian TV network, leading to Spears contributing a cooking segment called "Cruci-fixin's." As a young girl, the 24-year-old Spears was a regular on "The Mickey Mouse Club."

After becoming a pop singer, she starred in the critically panned 2002 film "Crossroads."

Boy George to fight NY drug charges

NEW YORK — Singer Boy George is innocent and will fight the drug possession charges he faces in New York, which could result in 15 years in prison if he is convicted, his lawyer said on Wednesday.

George, wearing a full-length coat, appeared in Manhattan Criminal Court on Wednesday to answer charges stemming from an October incident when police, responding to his call to report a burglary, found 13 bags of cocaine in his apartment.

The case was adjourned until March 8 after the singer's lawyer, Lou Freeman, asked for more time to prepare his case.

No plea was entered during the brief hearing.

Jennifer Palermo, sophomore in elementary education, runs a lap on the Clarenburg Trail at City Park Tuesday morning. Palermo runs three miles around the park.

Warm weather draws students to local walking, jogging routes

By Ashleigh Williams
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Jenny Palermo said she enjoys exercising in the nice weather because she can watch the other joggers in City Park.

"I like to watch all the people out when I am running," Palermo, sophomore in pre-professional elementary education, said. "The weather has been great for being outside lately."

City Park is close to campus and student housing, and offers a one-mile path around the park for walkers and joggers. Palermo said she uses the park in between classes because it is close to her apartment.

"I can run in between classes or if it starts getting dark or turning to bad weather," she said. "Once it starts getting close to dark I always make sure that I start heading home."

Manhattan offers several jogging trails, according to the Manhattan Parks and Recreation Web site. The Linear Park Trail consists of nine miles of terrain for walkers and joggers, and the trail also provides exiting points at various places along the way.

The Northeast Community Park, Frank Anneberg Park and Warner Memorial Park also provide jogging routes.

Park superintendent Eddie Eastes said students using these paths should be conscientious of their surroundings and take the proper safety precautions.

"Jog with other people, be mindful of lighting situations and be aware of where you are going," Eastes said. "You might not have an immediate exit point so make sure you know your own limits."

Chris Grennan, senior in biochemistry, said he enjoys making his own running paths.

"I like to run at many different places, but my favorite includes a three-mile loop around campus," he said.

Grennan said he jogs about four times a week and prefers to jog outside.

"I like jogging outside because I like the fresh air and the different places you can run," he said. "When you jog inside, you always have the same surroundings."

Shelly Unruh, senior in social sciences, said she sometimes jogs at Peters Recreation Complex because of the safe atmosphere.

"I prefer jogging indoors at the Rec at night because I feel safer," Unruh said. "I can go run there anytime of the day and always feel safe."

Though Unruh prefers jogging inside at night, she said that she does occasionally jog at City Park.

"When the weather is nice, I do like to go out and run during the day every once in a while," she said. "It gives me a chance to enjoy the sun and be outside."

Students repair aircraft

By Bhagavathy Umamaheswar
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

For the first time at K-State-Salina, aviation maintenance students at the College of Technology and Aviation will prepare planes for actual flights.

Using class and lab assignments during the spring semester, students enrolled in one of the three courses will help return the aircraft to airworthy status.

"Airworthy status means that the aircraft are safe, prepped and worthy of flight," said Andrew Smith, assistant professor of aviation maintenance at K-State-Salina.

One of the three courses is the power plant course, in which students help replace old engine parts with new or replaceable ones. Another class is aircraft finish and fabrication, which focuses on application of paint finishes to aircraft surfaces, including trim colors, registration numbers and the aircraft inspection. There is also an assembly course that studies the inspection methods and processes that ensure the aircraft meet design standards.

"We have a 33,000-square-foot aviation center, computer labs and state-of-the-art training equipment, like operable turbine engines and flyable piston engines," said Rebecca Armstrong, assistant professor at K-State-Salina. "We are one of the only schools in the region which offers a four-year degree and is undertaking a project of this magnitude," she said.

Two sail planes and one motor glider were purchased from the Federal Surplus through the U.S. Air Force Academy and will be used as training equipment, Smith said.

"The sailplanes/gliders are scheduled to fly this spring semester, while the Cessna 150 should be complete and ready to fly at the end of next spring semester," Smith said.

Smith said the highlight of the project was the benefit of doing "live work." He said the intimate involvement of the students would give them practical experience and the excitement of seeing the aircraft fly.

Landon Truetken, junior in aeronautical technology-aviation maintenance, has been interested in aviation all his life.

"I think the project is a great idea because it gives us a chance to work on something that will actually fly again," he said. "This is crucial since it is exactly what we will be doing in the field."

Referring to the aviation maintenance at K-State-Salina as "top of the line," Truetken said he is looking forward to the satisfaction of watching the plane take off for the first time.

Zach Lewis, who spent five years in the Marine Corps serving as an avionics technician on the AV-8B Harrier, is now a junior in the aeronautical technology-aviation maintenance. A self-proclaimed victim of the "Top Gun" era, Lewis said he is anticipating working through the process.

"I am most excited about the painting and cabin restoration," Lewis said. "The project instills a sense of pride throughout the maintenance department, because we all want to produce a quality product."

Any student desiring to study aviation maintenance and meeting the pre-requisites for these courses is eligible. Students enrolled in the courses are part of the airworthiness projects.

"We try to restore as many planes as we can and get them to airworthy status," Armstrong said. "The proceeds from the sale of such restored planes help us acquire more airplanes. This way the students benefit immensely by getting hands-on experience in the area."

Smith said the project is funded through the departmental budget like all other laboratory activities. Some of the funding also has been provided by revenue through the sale of department surplus and scrap materials.

"This project helps the students focus on detail because it's much more crucial," Smith said. "The knowledge that the aircraft will be in the air is a driving incentive for students to work with the faculty to make sure that everything is right."

At K-State-Salina, students can choose from three curricula of aviation maintenance. An airframe and power plant certificate, which is a two-year program, prepares students for the Federal Aviation Administration airframe and power plant certificate.

Students can also earn an associate's degree in addition to the certificate, which includes general education courses recommended by the Kansas Board of Regents.

Bachelor's degrees along with the certificate prepare students to become maintenance technicians with futures in management positions.

"Our students get jobs as licensed technicians at major airlines, national and international carriers, regional airlines and corporate and general aviation operators," Smith said.

He also said there is a good track record of student placements with recruiters such as Raytheon, Duñcan Aviation and Yingling Aviation.

"We try to make the experience here as real to the world as possible," Smith said. "It's their (the students') dream to get the aircraft out of the hangar and into the air."

SIGNING | Focus turns to Spring practice, game

kept that tradition by again signing a wealth of talent from the junior college ranks.

"We have a unique situation because a lot of players, like myself, get a chance to ... go into the incubator for two years and go to one of the community colleges here in the state,"

Prince said. "I want to make sure that we do a good job in our community college system of evaluating those second-chance players."

Prince will now turn his attention to spring practice, which will culminate with the annual Spring Game on April 22.

Prince said, while recruiting never ends, he will now shift a lot of his focus to the current team.

"Recruiting ends when the Waffle House closes," he said. "But we have to prepare our team and get our team ready. We'll sit down as a coaching staff and try to get a sense of how much and when we'll install (the system)."

MYERS | Retired general's exact role undecided

Century Studies. Institute director Mark Parillo, associate professor of history, said that members of the executive board have been discussing the type of work Myers will do with the institute.

"Myers' exact role has yet to be determined," he said.

"He will most likely have a formal relationship with the institute; we might invite him to be a fellow," he said.

The retired general's first appearance on the Institute's behalf will take place in May when he is scheduled to speak at the Society for Military History's annual meeting in Manhattan.

Parillo said Myers' participation in the meeting will increase the visibility of the university's military science and history departments across the nation.

Myers' involvement in the war in Afghanistan during his tenure as Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff could also draw other esteemed military figures to speak at the university.

"Although he is no longer actively involved in the ongoing war in Afghanistan," Parillo said, "he might be able to get some of the high-ranking decision-makers to come here and speak."

Rick Savage, junior in mechanical engineering, said he thought publicity for K-State through Bush's lecture and Myers' hiring would benefit the university.

"It's a good opportunity for K-State students to be able to interact with such a prestigious official," Savage said.

"Between the Landon Lecture and Myers being in the news, I think there will be a really positive effect on enrollment."

"All of this publicity came at a really good time."

on 8-of-13 shooting, and helped the Tigers erase the 19-point halftime deficit to send the game into overtime.

"In the first half, I thought we jumped out on them and were playing great defense, and it kept us in the game the last 10 minutes of the first half when we stopped taking advantage of our offensive opportunities," coach Deb Patterson said. "I thought we carried that over to the second half."

Patterson also said the Wildcats' second-half defense played a part in the Tigers' comeback victory.

"It was a night in which our personality on defense between the first and second half was night and day," she said. "We let them get their penetration game going in the second half."

Offensively in the second half, freshman JoAnn Hamlin kept K-State close during Missouri's run, by scoring 14 of the Wildcat's 22 second-half points.

"In the first half, I didn't play as well as I wanted to and in the second half, I knew I needed to come out for my team," said Hamlin, who finished with a game-high 23 points. "When they got it in (to me), I started finishing, and I just knew I needed to be there for my team."

Junior Claire Coggins had an open look at the end of regulation, but her shot was off target.

"I had a great look tonight," said Coggins, who finished with 10 points. "I didn't do everything that I probably could have done to finish the shot. I pulled up early. It's disappointing when I have that (shot), and I don't finish."

K-State's loss gave Missouri its first regular season sweep of the Wildcats since 2001. The overtime defeat was also K-State's first home loss of the Big 12 season.

the play, whether it's a rebound, a defensive play, a field goal - there is no magic wand, you've just got to make it," Wooldridge said.

K-State built an 11-point lead with nine minutes until halftime.

Baylor's Henry Dugat pulled the Bears to within one at the break by exploding for 17 points and five 3-pointers.

Dugat, a freshman guard, finished with a game-high 23 points on 8-of-21 shooting.

"I tried to step up tonight," Dugat said. "I appreciate the team getting me involved and getting me shots."

Baylor grabbed its first lead at 47-45 with less than 15 minutes to play in the second half, when sophomore guard Aaron Bruce hit a three.

Bruce scored just 10 points on 4-of-14 shooting.

Baylor Coach Scott Drew said he was proud of his team.

"I know from a coaching standpoint, like proud parents, it's great to see the little growth during the season," Drew said.

TURNPIKE | Privatization a possibility for road

because it's already annoying that I have to pay so much money to go home," said Smith, junior in family studies and human services.

Smith said if the current $4 round-trip toll increases greatly, her visits home will likely decline.

"It would probably depend how great the increase was," Smith said. "If it was $15, I would probably go home less, because that's about the same price as gas to get home."

As lawmakers consider the proposal, Smith said she hoped the politicians would think about the increase students and commuters would have to pay.

"I would just hope as they are making the decision, they would consider the effects it would have at K-State, that they would think about us," she said.

Audrey Baker, senior in elementary education, said traveling home to Olathe, Kan., already seemed too expensive for using a public road.

"It seems kind of ridiculous that we have to pay for our own roads," she said.

Baker said an increase in cost would hurt officials as well as turnpike users.

"It seems like a lot of people would be opposed to it," Baker said. "It causes more harm for everybody."

Sarah Hughey, junior in music education from Olathe, Kan., said she thought the current prices were already too much.

"It is kind of ridiculous, making money off of college students," Hughey said. "They're using money to make money."

If the proposal is passed and tolls increase, Hughey said she would likely try to find an alternative route home.

"I think they should just leave it the way it is," she said. "If they're going to jack up the prices, they should just leave it the way it is."

Burns ends 3 fees

By Adrienne DeWeese
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Student Body President Michael Burns announced the elimination of transcript, graduation and Career and Employment Services fees Thursday night at Student Senate.

Effective immediately, the $15 graduation fee is no longer in place. Students graduating in May who have already paid the graduation fee will receive refund checks, Burns said.

As of July 1, the $8 transcript fee and $30 fee for certain CES services are eliminated.

"Career and Employment Services will grow a lot because a lot more students will be utilizing their services,"

See FEES Page 14

Student health fee to increase

By Adrienne DeWeese
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Student Senate voted unanimously Thursday night for an increase in the student health privilege fee.

Students enrolled in 12 or more credit hours will pay an additional $102.07 for health costs in fiscal year 2007. The increase per student will drop to $88.42 in fiscal year 2008, and it will increase again to $91.77 in fiscal year 2009.

Privilege Fee Chair Matt Wagner said the Privilege Fee Committee met for about a month to review Lafene Health Center's expenditures and budget.

Lafene has not seen an increase in its $3.2 million budget in the last three fiscal years, Wagner said.

With rising health care costs, Wagner said charging an office visit fee would not benefit students' welfare. The increase is appropriate to account for health care costs, he said.

"The only other way to generate this amount was through office visit charges, which would have impaired students' health on campus," Wagner said.

Privilege Fee Committee member Tim Weninger said the increase in student health privilege fee is in the best interest of Lafene's operation.

"I think Lafene is an invaluable resource on campus," Weninger said. "Students are happy to pay a reasonable fee to use it."

Student Senate also voted unanimously Thursday for the establishment of a student health reserve account at Lafene. The account will receive a $200,000 allocation in fiscal year 2007 and $60,000 in following fiscal years. Once the account reaches $400,000, the account will cap, Wagner said.

"The account will be available for unknown expenditures that might arise," he said.

Man dies after falling down elevator shaft

By Leann Sulzen
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

A senior electrician with Housing and Dining Services died Thursday after falling down an elevator shaft in Haymaker Hall.

Paul D. White, 50, was working on a problem with the elevator doors in Haymaker when he fell down the elevator shaft between 8:45 and 9 a.m., said Cheryl May, assistant vice president of K-State Media Relations and Marketing. After the fall, White was taken to Mercy Regional Health Center where he died.

White

Capt. Troy Lane of the K-State Police said he was unable to comment on how far White fell or what caused White's fall because the case is still under investigation.

"We still have people looking into this," he said. "We still have people speaking to witnesses."

White's brother-in-law Ron Walter also worked for Housing and Dining Services and said he heard about an accident involving an elevator over his radio.

"When I heard the chatter on the radio I immediately went to Haymaker Hall because I felt in my heart that Paul was probably involved," Ron said. "His primary job was to keep the elevators working."

Once he arrived, Ron said he found a crowd of people in Haymaker trying to figure out what was going on.

"By looking at the scene

I could tell the situation was serious," he said.

Ron said he took a leave of absence for the rest of the day and went home to console his wife, White's sister, Barbara Walter.

Barbara said she hoped people remember her brother as a hard-working man who enjoyed his job.

"I always said, 'Are you afraid that you will fall off of one of those (elevators)?'" Barbara said. "And he would just laugh and said, 'No, that is just part of my job.'" in pre-construction science and management, lives on the ninth floor of Haymaker and said he saw a man working on the elevator Thursday morning when he was on his way to breakfast. However, he said he wasn't sure if it was White because he heard rumors of people seeing him on other floors.

Medina said when he rode the elevator next to the one White fell from after his classes Thursday, he felt strange.

University program aims to curb amount of trash sent to waste center

By Abby Brownback
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

More than 845,000 pounds of recycled material were collected by KSU Recycling in 2005, according to totals from the Division of Facilities.

At least 30 locations on campus house recycling bins as part of a recycling initiative that began in the late 1980s, Al Seely, assistant director of Facilities Services, said.

The goal of KSU Recycling is to remove as much recycled material as possible off campus, but to keep it out of landfills, John Woods, director of Facilities Services, said.

"Our objective is to keep reducing the amount that goes to the transfer station," Seely said.

The program is run primarily through Custodial Services, but funds are drawn from several departmental budgets, Woods said.

The program also receives funds from the City/University Fund and grants from the Kansas Department of Health and Environment, said Steve Galitzer, director of the Department of Environmental Health and Safety. With that funding, KSU Recycling hires one full-time classified employee and several student workers.

"It actually runs itself on a fairly frugal system," Galitzer said.

A portion of program expenses is recouped when the recycled material is taken to Howie's Enterprises Inc., Seely said. K-State receives $20 per ton of recycled material.

The most weight comes from cardboard, Seely said. A large amount of plastic also is recycled, but it does not provide much weight.

KSU Recycling also collects computers and other e-waste and takes it to Kansas Computer Recycling Center Inc. in Topeka.

In a recent initiative, the recycling program is expanding desk-side recycling this year.

In Durland, Rathbone, Fiedler and Throckmorton halls, the program puts bins in each office, and building occupants sort the materials. Custodians then haul the material outside when they remove trash at the end of the day.

"If we can make it just as easy to recycle as to throw away, most people will recycle," he said.

In the residence halls, recycling efforts have been short-lived, Galitzer said, because any efforts are student-initiated and need space.

"It's a high-burnout job," Galitzer said. "It requires space, and we've been losing space for recycling in the residence halls."

Seely said there used to be recycling containers in Moore Hall, but the containers were removed because too much trash was put in them.

KSU Recycling is not connected to recycling in the city of Manhattan, Seely said. The city tried to start curbside recycling, but did not succeed.

"We would like to think we're trying to set a good example," Seely said. "Both the county and the university have a stake in this."

New house speaker gets local response

By Jonas Hogg
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

House Republicans have elected representative John Boehner of Ohio as the new majority leader, The Associated Press reported.

The election comes after a tightly contested race between Boehner and Rep. Roy Blunt, R-Mo.

Boehner will succeed Rep. Tom Delay, R-Texas who stepped down on Sept. 28, 2005 after being indicted for criminal conspiracy charges.

Blunt, who serves as house whip, filled the position until now.

The election comes at a time when trust in national lawmaking bodies is on the decline.

Ben Davis, junior in political science, said he supports the decision.

"From what I know of him, I think he'll be a good guy," Davis, public relations coordinator for the College Republicans, said.

Boehner has caused controversy in the past.

First, by being a member of the "Gang of Seven" that attempted to draw attention to alleged ethics problems in the then Democrat-controlled Congress.

Later, in 1998 he was part of a Republican group that sought to oust Republican house speaker, Newt Gingrich.

Many are looking to Boehner to fulfill his campaign promise to work to restore the faith of the American people.

"He wants to get the public's trust back in Congress, which I think is desperately needed for both sides," Davis said.

Davis said he is anxious to see what changes Boehner will bring.

"It's time to really unite our party and really come out with a bold agenda," he said. "I think it would be good for the midterm elections and ultimately in '08."

Boehner has stepped away from the party line on several occasions.

Recently, he has voted against the GOP-backed immigration bill as well as the highway bill, which has been criticized as being pork-barrel spending.

Boehner has reportedly clashed with Delay on several occasions, and some see his election as the GOP's attempt to distance itself from the Delay affair.

"I think ... it was semi-symbolic of the Republicans trying to distance themselves from Delay and people that were in power when Delay was in power," said Jeff Smith, senior in political science and president of the Young Democrats.

Despite his differences with Delay, some critics allege that Boehner is ideologically similar to his predecessor.

"It doesn't look like the Republicans have elected somebody who's going to vary substantially in ideology," Smith said.

Smith said he is waiting to see how Boehner will handle his new position.

"He's never had top leadership before," he said. "I think it'll be interesting to see what kind of work he does to bring the two parties together."

Attorney helps immigrants adjust

By Lacey D. Mackey
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Kimberly Corum began teaching Spanish after receiving a bachelor of arts degree in Spanish and French and a master's degree in Spanish from K-State, but after seeing a local need, she went back to the books to help make a difference.

Corum said she decided to study immigration law after talking with her husband and noticing the need.

"Living here in Kansas, international law wasn't something I wanted to focus on, and for a long time, I was undecided," Corum said. "But my husband had been talking for a long time about how Manhattan needed an immigration attorney, and when I got out of law school, I looked at it very carefully, and it just made sense."

Dick Seaton, senior university attorney for K-State, said Corum's work in immigration law is a vital resource in the Manhattan area.

"She's the only one, and the need for this service seems to be a growing one," Seaton said.

Seaton said Corum worked as a clerk for his office in the past, and he said he was able to see her work ethic and talent.

"She's a very quick study," Seaton said. "She catches on and is a good researcher, which is good for this field."

Corum said the background in language prepared her for law school.

"If you can read 15th century Spanish literature, you can read anything the Supreme Court writes," she said. "It really takes your vocabulary and your reading comprehension and just your attention span and raises it through the roof."

Corum said working in immigration law allows her to combine a love for language and the need for law.

Steven Doll | COLLEGIAN

Kimberly Corum saw a need in the Manhattan community for immigration law. She returned to law school, and using her language skills, has become Manhattan's only immigration attorney.

"It's great that I get to use my Spanish, and sometimes use my French and bring my past career together with what I'm doing now," she said.

Although Corum shifted from teaching to law, she said working in the judicial system requires helping others learn how the system works.

"A lot of my job is to teach people how things work here, explain the system to someone and help them understand it," Corum said.

Chantz Martin, Corum's office assistant, has been impressed with his employer's knowledge of her profession.

"She's amazingly professional," said Martin, junior in political science. "She's a brilliant woman, and she's well-versed in the field."

The majority of Corum's work focuses on visa processing, and her work is split between employment and family-based applications.

"When someone enters the country, they need permission, and I help people get into the category they want," Corum said.

As one of the only immigration attorneys in the area, Corum said she works with a wide range of clients and explained the last 10 people who have called her office have been from nine different countries and five different continents.

Corum said her work involves helping people with the steps and paperwork to reach their goals.

For more information
www.corumlaw.com

Although she prepares paperwork for some clients, Corum said she also answers questions about the system of law.

"The immigration system is much like the tax system. It's very complicated, constantly changing," she said.

Because of the complexity of her work, face-to-face consultation is preferable, Corum said.

"I think especially when someone is foreign, and most of the time they've never seen a lawyer before, it's very intimidating to do that important business that affects your life over the telephone," Corum said.

TO THE POINT Recycling starts with awareness; support needed

It's time for Manhattan and K-State to join together to establish a more effective recycling program.

We only have one earth, and with enough problems going on in the world, why not eliminate the recycling problem right here in the Little Apple?

The fact that K-State offers recycling in 30 different locations on campus is a step in the right direction toward preserving our environment. However, in order to establish a more successful recycling program, the city of Manhattan should seriously consider offering curb-side recycling.

Because the majority of students live off campus, and most likely do not want to haul their beer cans and newspapers on campus or to the not-so-nearby community recycling bins, it would be more efficient if the city would implement curb-side recycling.

Not only would curb-side recycling increase students' and citizens' recycling habits, it also would create a cleaner, prettier environment throughout Manhattan. No longer would you be walking to class or strolling down the street and see cans littering the grass.

There is a simple solution — Manhattan should offer curb-side recycling, in addition to K-State's campus recycling. It might be one small step, but the world — or at least the Little Apple — would be a better place.

To the point is an editorial selected and debated by the editorial board and written after a majority opinion is formed. This is the Collegian's official opinion.

A witness' account

Memory of kind act pulls columnist out of lull

Once, in the not too distant past, I was going to my mother's house to visit and eat some dinner. I was in one of those irritable moods — the people I normally like annoyed me, and all I seemed to hear about was gossip and scandal.

CODY HOLUB

When I got there, I began watching the news on TV and saw that a murder had occurred hither, a sexual deviant had been picked up thither.

It was making me even further depressed. I saw this little book sitting on the coffee table called "Life's Instructions for Wisdom, Success, and Happiness," so I picked it up and opened it to a random page and read one of the few adages on it.

"If you look for the worst in life and in people, you'll find it. But if you look for the best, you'll find that instead."

Was that my problem? Was I paying too much attention to the negative, when there really was just as much positive that I could have been focusing on? After a few moments of contemplation I tried another page.

"Whoever said you can't buy happiness forgot about puppies."

That gave me an idea: I turned the channel from the news to "The Planet's Funniest Animals" on Animal Planet. I started giggling. I was starting to like this game. So, I tried another page.

"When a person compliments your tie, take it off, and give it to him. He will never forget the gesture."

My memory snapped. I was transported back to a time last semester when I went out to Aggieville with one of my best friends, Eric Taylor. The bars were closing down, and Eric and I were walking back to my house to hang out.

Along the way, this one guy complimented Eric's Honda mechanics shirt that he was wearing. He then proceeded to take us to his Honda CRX to show us all the work that he had put into it. He was so excited to point out each detail that he installed himself.

Eric replied, "Cool ... cool," as the guy spiritedly pointed out each item. While Eric was saying that to him, he was looking at me with an expression that implied, "What's with this guy?" I found Eric's pleasant demeanor with the stranger amusing.

I thought the conversation was going to end after the stranger showed us his car, but he kept on chattering. He started talking about all sorts of things.

He told us how he loved his girlfriend and how they had both lost weight together. And how her mom wanted him to marry her daughter because he was the only one who could tame her.

Basically, he told us everything that someone normally wouldn't reveal until they had been acquainted for at least a few weeks. This stranger spoke with such passion and candor.

After Eric listened to this guy for fifteen or twenty minutes — it seemed like I was just an observer to the whole situation — he took off his shirt that stranger had complimented him on, and he handed it to him and said, "Take this."

The guy's mouth dropped and he was speechless — for the first time. Eric said, "I'm sure you'll enjoy this more than I could." Then, Eric began walking away while the stranger was utterly baffled, still holding the shirt in his hand with his arm extended. I started to follow Eric and I could hear the guy say very sincerely, "Thanks."

As the wave of nostalgia washed over me and crept away, I returned back to reality to the living room that I was in, Animal Planet still on in the background. The memory of Eric's good deed made me think about how I don't do that sort of thing often enough. I realized I was still holding the book in my hand so my eyes fell to the open page.

"Don't be discouraged over the opportunities you have missed; there are many more right around the bend."

Foreign languages pose numerous hassles

There is a force in my life that is a permanent nemesis. It is virtually undetectable to those with no previous contact, but once it penetrates your existence, it's over. You will eat it, breathe it and scream it out in moments of heated passion.

Foreign languages. It takes various forms, so that too many people won't become accustomed to its shape. In my case, it was Spanish.

I first became aware of its existence in high school. I was lulled into a false sense of security by being promised lots of field trips and a teacher that didn't care if I cheated. They eased me into it slowly, not wanting to scare me off. This enemy even convinced me to continue my adventure with Spanish in college.

Suddenly, I was thrown into a world of stem changes, irregular verbs and preterite verb forms. Voy, vas, va, vamos van, what does it all mean? I began to panic. My world turned upside down and was violently shaken Monday through Thursday, from 12:30-1:20 p.m.

My eyes would narrow and my palms would sweat everyday as I made my way up the stairs to face my biggest fear. Every day, I fought the urge to plunge to the floor in agony, eyes bulging and face contorted, using my fingernails to crawl to the exit, moaning, "no me gusta ... no me gusta ..."

It wasn't that I didn't understand it; I simply didn't like it, and I sure as hell didn't trust it. Spanish was this mysterious world, and I felt uneasy tiptoeing through it. There were too many ways to go wrong, too many holes to fall into.

However, I am a fighter, and I wasn't about to let slippery Spanish get the best of me. So I studied my culo off and ended up with a decent enough grade in the class. I felt invincible.

That is, until this semester when I realized I had to embark on the next chapter of my villain's attempt to destroy me. Spanish III. I began to grow weary, and I fear that I will not make it to see Spanish IV.

I am beginning to see through his plan. My enemy is wearing me down by repetition. The same words, the same formations, day after day, each like a bullet into my mind. This foe, Spanish, thinks that by pitching unusable vocabulary words at me, it will reach success. For instance, the word for "mosquito." Unless, of course, I was traveling the Amazon and I needed to warn my Spanish companion about the malaria-ridden insect crawling on his arm.

Each time a new verb form is pounded into my skull, I think my spirit dies a little. My unfortunate situation cannot be fixed; however, it has propelled me to warn all you foreign-language targets out there: think before you take that step. My supposed bilingual capabilities are becoming detrimental to my mental health, and I wish to see no one go down that never-ending tube of hell as I have.

So think twice before you brave this path. They will try and lure you in with false promises of achievement and skill, but in the end, all you get is little sleep and a half hour of language lab each week.

My advice is to walk in the light. Save yourselves, mis amigos, save yourselves.

Wedding customs and ceremonies vary by religion

By Kaley Lyon
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

All wedding ceremonies have a few basic things in common, but customs vary between different religions and denominations.

JUDAISM

Though wedding traditions vary between Orthodox, Conservative and Reform Judaism, Jewish wedding ceremonies share many customs that differentiate them from ceremonies practiced by other faiths.

"They all deal with blessing God and thanking Him for the possibility of a marriage between a man and a woman," said Charlotte Edelman, former President of the Manhattan Jewish Congregation.

It is customary, especially in Orthodox and Conservative Judaism, for the bride, or kallah, and the groom, or chatan, not to see each other for at least 24 hours prior to the ceremony. However, this is not always done.

It is also customary in these wedding ceremonies for the kallah and chatan to fast on the day of the wedding, from dawn until the completion of the ceremony.

Dress for the occasion is typically formal, and the kallah usually wears a traditional wedding dress. However, the dress is more conservative than dresses worn in other ceremonies and usually has long sleeves that cover the shoulders, Edelman said.

The chatan is escorted down the aisle by his parents, where he waits for the kallah, also escorted by her parents. The wedding party congregates under a canopy called a chuppa, which consists of four poles and a cover.

The chuppa is frequently symbolic of being married in a temple, and some people believe it also signifies the home the couple will build together, Edelman said.

Rings are exchanged, and the couple receives one of seven blessings given throughout the ceremony. In an Orthodox wedding, the kallah circles the groom seven times, in conjunction with the seven blessings.

After the union is complete, the chatan traditionally breaks a glass at the end of the ceremony. There are many explanations for this, but it often signifies that, even in times of happiness and joy, you have to remember there are times of sadness, Edelman said.

Most Jewish weddings take place on a Sunday and are followed by a celebration of family and friends. It is also at the reception that the bride and groom break their fast.

While Jewish wedding ceremonies emphasize the joining of two lives, this union is interpreted differently than in Christian ceremonies.

"In some of the Christian ceremonies there is the concept of the two becoming one," Edelman said. "That's not quite the Jewish tradition -- it is that they form a union, but are still individuals."

CHRISTIANITY

Though slight differences exist between different Christian denominations, namely Catholicism and Protestantism, all Christian ceremonies share the same basic traditions, such as the exchange of rings and the lighting of a unity candle.

"Those are different ways of expressing a covenant that's between the husband and wife, and that also includes God," said the Rev. Mitch Todd of K-State United Methodist Campus Ministries.

In Christian weddings, the bride and groom usually exchange vows as a public declaration of the couple's love for each other, Todd said.

It is also traditional for the bride to be given away on behalf of the entire family by her father or a close relative. The significance of this has changed over the years, and represents a transition from one family to another, not the bride being given away as family property.

"We do place an emphasis on how marriage unites two families," Todd said. "Not just the two people involved but their families, congregation and friends are also involved in the process."

Christian ceremonies can be performed anywhere under a certified religious official and vary in length and formality, and are typically followed by a wedding reception.

ISLAM

As in other religions, Islamic wedding ceremonies vary greatly according to location and culture.

"From distant regions to different cities they really vary a lot," said Fayez Hussein, professor of interior architecture and product design.

Most Muslim weddings, however, consist of two separate ceremonies -- a religious and a civil ceremony.

The first step to a marital union is the engagement period. If the couple decides marriage is the right decision for them, they will host an engagement party, where family and friends come together in celebration.

It is also during the engagement party that the bride and groom exchange rings, but the rings are placed on the right hand. Wearing a ring on the right hand signals that someone is engaged; the rings will be switched to the left hand during the civil ceremony.

A religious clergy performs the civil ceremony, and it is at this time that an official agreement is recorded. Following this act, the couple announces the religious ceremony, which will make the marriage official, but not yet socially accepted.

It is during the religious ceremony that the dowry, a written agreement of material goods between the bride, the groom and the parents, is established.

"The dowry could be anything, it could only be one dollar," Hussein said. "But it's really symbolic and has to be done."

Following the ceremonies, the couple completes the third and final stage of becoming man and wife, which is the social wedding.

During the social wedding, the bride and groom invite guests to share in the ceremony. Following this event, the couple takes what other cultures refer to as a honeymoon, where the couple joins together as husband and wife.

HINDUISM

According to www.weddingzone.com, Hinduism is the world's third-largest religion. Hindu wedding ceremonies have many characteristics that differentiate them from other religions and cultures.

A priest, or Brahmin, initiates the ceremony. The ceremony begins with the couple standing on a decorated wooden plank as the priest holds a curtain between them. Guests shower the couple with rice and other grains.

The wedding begins when the curtain is removed and garlands of sandalwood chips are placed around the necks of the bride and groom.

As in other customs, the bride's father gives her to the groom. The bride applies sandalwood paste to the groom's forehead, which symbolizes the tikka, or divine eye. According to www.frugalfun.com, this is a sacred symbol to aid in the search for God.

The groom also applies a red mark on the bride's forehead, which will be displayed for the entire duration of their marriage.

The bride and groom throw puffed rice and purified butter into the fire, which represents the Radiant One, as the priest chants mantras, or blessings.

The groom takes his bride by the hand and leads her around the fire. Holding hands, they walk along where the rice is heaped to one side and take the sapta padi, which is a seven step symbolic journey to life.

On this symbolic journey, they agree to earn a living for their family and respect their abundance, live a healthy life for each other, be concerned for their partner's welfare, life together as friends, be with each other on special occasions, desire children and adapt to the other person at any given time and place.

Cotton is tied around the bride and groom while they receive blessings for a long, happy life. The bride then washes her hand and the couple prays for their prosperity. The groom then places a floral necklace around the bride's neck, which is a symbol of his love.

A necklace of silver or gold, with semi-circles and black beads from both families, is also worn to symbolize the union of two families.

BUDDHISM

Wedding customs also vary throughout the different schools and practices of Buddhism.

"I can't speak for everyone," said Christina Hauck, associate professor of English, who practices Buddhism in the Quantum School of Zen. "The school is worldwide and people like to improvise everywhere."

In the Quantum School of Zen, wedding ceremonies begin with an opening bell and the lighting of candles and incense.

The bride and groom bow to each other as a way of displaying humility and repentance and offer Buddha incense and flowers. Incense is supposed to help meditation, and flowers represent an important moment in Buddhism, Hauck said.

The bride and groom sit on mats in front of the official where they receive the highest blessings, which include vast learning, the support of mother and father, generosity and ethical integrity.

Ceremonies take place in Zen Centers. The one nearest to Manhattan is in Lawrence.

Marriage vows are exchanged, in translation of the noble eightfold path into appropriate conduct: correct views, thoughts, conduct, speech, livelihood, effort, mindfulness and meditation.

Vows are often written by the couple -- when Hauck was married in a 1997 Buddhist wedding ceremony, the couple's vows applied the five precepts of Buddhism to their marriage. The five precepts are to abstain from taking life, from stealing, from sexual misconduct, from lying and from intoxicants.

"The ceremony itself is long and complicated, involves a lot of talking, bowing and chanting, and like all ceremonies, ends with a party," Hauck said.

Though rings are often exchanged, this is of no Buddhist

Private instruction or in-home dance practices help couples become more comfortable with their wedding-day dances

By Christina Hansen
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

A newlywed couple's first dance is often said to be the most memorable moment of a wedding reception.

Jenne Andrews, owner of Premiere Events, 1019 Poyntz Ave., said most couples feel a high level of pressure to look good during their first dance, especially the grooms.

"The guys often don't have much confidence," she said. "They don't want to embarrass themselves, and they want to impress their guests and their brides."

Andrews said recent movies and television shows such as "Shall We Dance" and "Dancing with the Stars" have helped make many men feel more comfortable with ballroom dancing.

A way for couples to prepare for their first dance is to choose a favorite song and practice dancing together at home, well in advance of the wedding.

"Even if a bride and groom just agree to dance in a circle, discussing it and practicing beforehand will help them to relax and enjoy their first dance," Andrews said.

Another option for couples who feel apprehensive about their reception is to take dancing lessons.

Sharron Washington, owner of Washington Dance Studio, 1124 Waters St., said private dance lessons for engaged couples are a growing trend at her studio.

Washington said lessons include several meetings with an instructor who helps the couple choose a song and a particular style of dance, and choreographs a dance for them to perform at their reception.

"We try to make it fun for them," she said. "The lessons are private, so it's very personal and relaxed."

Washington said bigger and more expensive wedding receptions are probably responsible for the growing number of couples taking lessons.

"I think that the trend of wedding receptions being more special than they used to has put more pressure on the couples," she said. "To feel more comfortable, people are returning to ballroom dancing lessons now."

Michelle Wettig, senior in anthropology, said she had noticed lots of advertisements promoting dance lessons while planning her upcoming wedding, but had no plans to take them with her fiancé.

"I've definitely noticed the trend," she said, "but we've danced quite a lot together, so that's one aspect of the reception I'm not really worried about."

Have a blast with position as maid of honor

A wedding is one of the most important days in a bride's life. But more often than not, things do not always go as planned. That is why the selection of the bridal party is crucial to making sure no one has a Bridezilla on their hands.

My best friend, Lacey, got engaged last summer and is now planning her May 2007 wedding. She chose me as the maid of honor, and right now I am just waiting for orders. My oldest sister got married four years ago, but my maid of honor duties were slim.

This time, it's all or nothing. The bridesmaids are old friends of ours and her sister-in-law. Over Christmas break she invited me to come watch her try on dresses, and that's when it was time for me to get things in gear.

Yes, the wedding is more than a year away, but things still need to be planned out to the fullest extent. According to www.bridesmaid101.com, the maid of honor is the "one who keeps things organized and under control as well as being the 'crisis counselor' for the bride." In my case, my friend Annie and I are the "enforcers," which means any person that shouldn't be there won't be, so the bride stays happy.

The Web site has a long list of proposed duties that a maid of honor should complete. Planning the bachelorette party and bridal party, helping the bride shop for her wedding dress and make the seating arrangements, attend and help with the rehearsal dinner, keep the bouquet during the ceremony, and many more duties that should help the bride keep her cool.

A maid of honor is supposed to be the wrangler of all the details, but sometimes the central message gets lost. The person is usually a friend or a family member who really should be just that. The wedding should be a time of happiness and love.

You have a job to do, but don't forget to keep being the friend, sister or cousin to the girl who is freaking out because her makeup isn't perfect. Marriage is a big deal, and she may be nervous, but the best thing possible is to be there for support.

Don't forget to get organized, but overall have fun. My best friend of 12 years only gets married once, and I want to have a good time and party with everybody I can. It is a wedding after all.

Options exist when choosing last names

By Hannah Crippen
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Many options are available for last names when people get married. The wife can take the husband's name, keep her given name, switch last names with her husband, add his name to hers, making her maiden name her middle name, she can hyphenate the two names, or she can use her husband's name socially and her name professionally. The husband, too, can choose any of these options for himself.

Another way to compromise is to pick a new last name altogether, either a combination of both birth names or a new one.

Bethany Roberts, staff attorney with Kansas Legal Services, said a man doesn't have to go through a different process to take the woman's last name, or take a hyphenated name.

"It's all about what's written on the marriage license," Roberts said. "You use that to change your Social Security card."

Other places to notify about a name change are passport, post, and voter-registration offices, utilities companies, subscriptions and insurance companies.

According to Kansas Statute 8-248, Chapter 8, Article 2, when people change their name because of marriage or otherwise, they need to notify their local Department of Motor Vehicles within 10 days.

David Thompson, instructor of family studies and human services, said people often have a problem with changing their name because their family history is important to them.

"The United States is primarily European in population," Thompson said. "Most of Europe was heavily influenced by the influx of Christianity. I think the history of the woman coming under the authority of a man probably goes back, historically, to the beginning of time."

Thompson said the historical woman's dependence on the man is also present in the traditional wedding ceremony.

"She goes from one man to another man," Thompson said. "Her hand is taken from her father's, put into the groom's, and there is no split-second when she is not under one man's authority, in the way that it's traditionally done. Of course, now, we live in a very different world."

Karen Myers-Bowman, associate professor of family studies and human services, and her husband chose to hyphenate their last names into one. Her sister was a graduate student when she got married, and also took a hyphenated last name with her husband.

"The reason why we hyphenated is because we wanted a family name that didn't give preference to one person's heritage over the other," Myers-Bowman said. "I didn't just keep my name and him keep his name because we wanted to all have the same name. We wanted our children to have our name."

Myers-Bowman has had to face some challenges by not following tradition.

"Even people who know us that way still sometimes slip," Myers-Bowman said. "We always take it as a teachable moment."

Sara Burdick Olson, May 2005 K-State graduate in lifespan human development, took a different approach. She chose to use her maiden name as her middle name.

"When I graduated with my undergraduate degree, I wasn't married, so my undergraduate degree was under my maiden name," Olson said. "I'm a very independent person."

Olson said she has noticed the trend among women and their choices when it comes to marriage.

"Women are more educated now and are getting married later in life," Olson said. "They've already established themselves under their maiden names."

Professor's book addresses discriminating jokes

By Kelsey Childress
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Leon Rappoport, professor emeritus at K-State, published a book in October 2005 by the Praeger Press.

The book, "Punchlines: The Case for Racial, Ethnic and Gender Humor," which is about 200 pages long, focuses on using prejudice and stereotypes in society as grounds for comedy.

Ashley Boldt, vice president of the Asian-American Student Union and junior in the Department of Family Studies and Human Services, said she believes that the topic of Rappoport's book is worth addressing.

"I think that the book's topic seems to address an issue that is very prevalent in society today," she said. "Racial, ethnic and gender-based humor can be seen quite often, and I think it would be interesting to see what the author has to say."

Rappoport said that he wrote the book because he wanted to know more about the resurgence of discriminating jokes in our society.

"I had become very interested in why there is so much ethnic, racial and gender humor in our society, despite concerns about political correctness," he said. "Many people mistakenly view all humor based on stereotypes as an indication of prejudice when it fact much of it ridicules prejudice."

"Punchlines" addresses several topics that range from the ambiguities of stereotypical humor to the racial slurs that lay the groundwork for this type of humor.

Rappoport conducted research in his course on the psychology of ethnic humor, where students were asked to write responses to certain jokes and obscenities. In addition to in-class and literary research on comedy, he said he also looked at the lives and works of comedians.

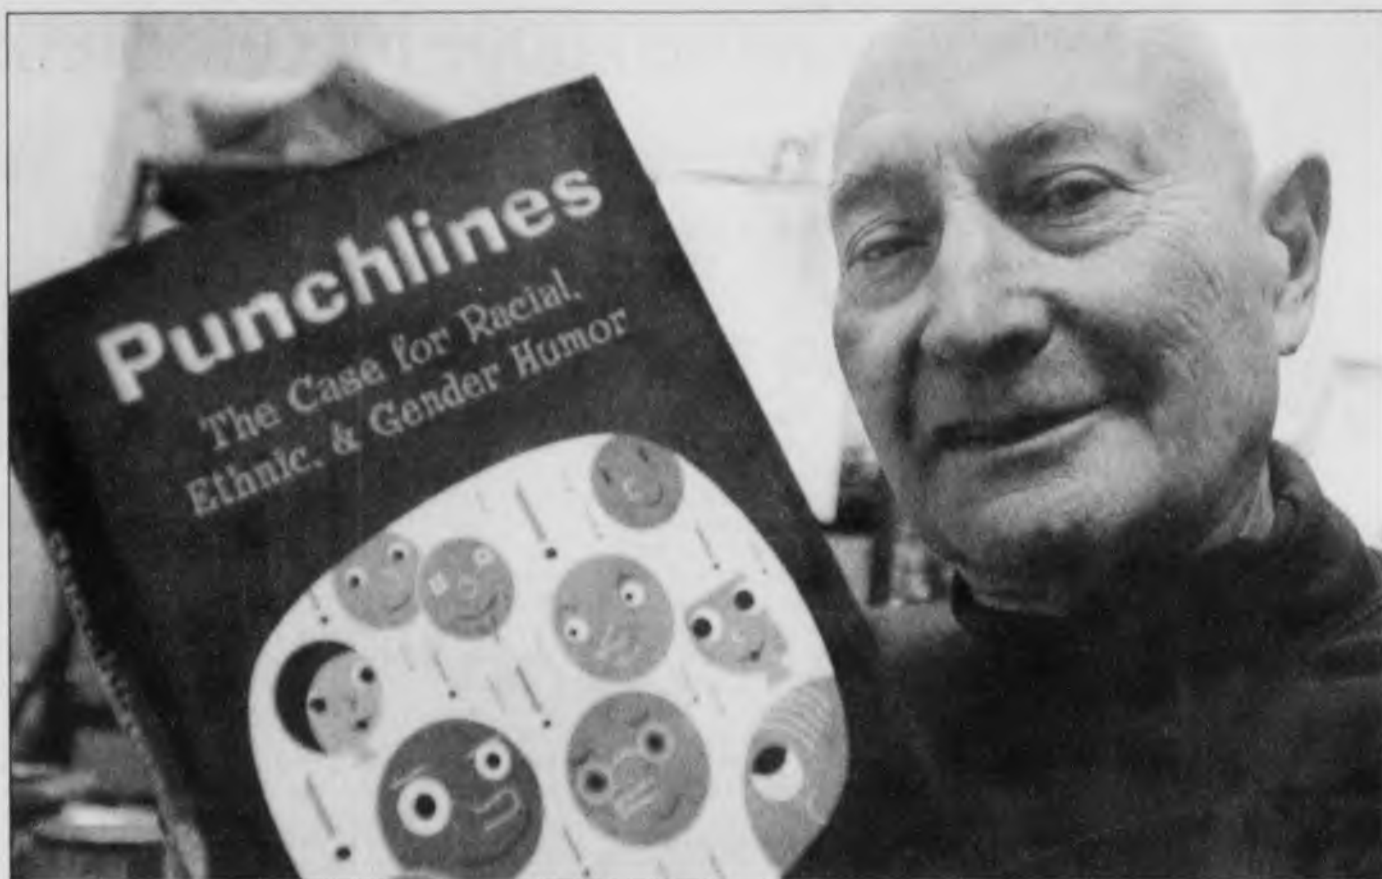

"I also examined biographies and memoirs of famous comedians like Richard Pryor, Chris Rock, and Whoopi Goldberg," he said.

Using humor is valuable tool in certain situations involving gender and racial issues, said Russell Fulmer, doctoral student in counseling and psychology.

"Humor is highly effective as an immediate stress reliever," Fulmer said. "It's an icebreaker; it alleviates the tension and anxiety so calm discussion could be had about the issues and views of the serious topic at hand."

Rappoport specializes in personality and social psychology.

He earned his undergraduate degree from New York University and graduate degree from the University of Colorado and eventually went to Oslo, Norway, to conduct research in social psychology as a National Science Foundation Postdoctoral Fellow. He then taught here in Manhattan from the fall of 1964 to 2003. He also was a visiting professor at Manhattanville College in New York during the 1968-1969 school year.

In addition to "Punchlines,"

Professor Rappoport has written several other books in different areas of psychology, including "Personality Development: The Chronology of Experience" and "How We Eat: Appetite, Culture and the Psychology of Food."

In addition to being an author and contributor to various research journals, Rappoport said he co-edited anthologies on human judgment processes, psychohistory and social problems.

Even though Rappoport doesn't plan to write any more books soon, he said he still plans to serve the K-State academic community.

"I occasionally act as a consultant on some research projects, and serve on a few doctoral thesis supervisory committees, but do not plan on starting any further research of my own," he said.

Policy proposal focuses on making colleges accountable with testing

By Holly Smith
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The Commission on the Future of Higher Education recently suggested that student testing be used to determine if a public college or university should receive federal money.

A specific plan for performance-based allocation has not yet been created, but the Bush administration said the change would make colleges more accountable.

"I would have concerns if that type of policy was enacted," said Paul Burden, assistant dean for the College of Education. "There are just too many uncontrolled factors involved."

Basing federal funding on test scores at the collegiate level illustrates many similarities to the No Child Left Behind Act.

"There were many complaints made about the No Child Left Behind Act in school districts across the country," Burden said. "This type of proposal would probably cause similar complaints."

Kelsey Sothers, sophomore in pre-pharmacy, said that students wouldn't be as influenced by the policy as professors and administrators.

"I think this would affect teachers and administrators most because it would cause them to work harder and do their job to the best of their ability so that they would receive funding," Sothers said.

Judith Richards, dean of education and flash facilitator at the Collaborative Intercultural Multilingual Advocacy Center, is concerned with the accuracy of testing students at K-State because of the high number of international students that attend K-State.

"We have a lot of international and Hispanic students who have a great grasp on content but not a strong grasp on English," Richards said. "These students would score poorly on a test not because they don't know the content, but because they don't have a strong grasp on the language."

Allocating funds based on academic performance rather than academic needs doesn't make sense, Richards said.

"It's similar to saying to a healthy person, 'here is some extra medicine and help for you,'" she said. "And then telling the sick person that they don't get any help or medicine because they are sick."

This type of policy would affect many aspects of K-State but students would be affected the most, Richards said.

"Students need help and the lower-performing students need the most help," Richards said. "In order to give them the help they need - we need the financial support to do it."

The Commission on the Future of Higher Education has until Aug. 1 to present policy recommendations to U.S. Secretary of Education, Margaret Spellings.

Richards said she didn't foresee any positive effects of instating No Child Left Behind type testing at the collegiate level.

"I don't see anything good that could possibly come out of standardized testing. I'm just so against it," Richards said. "I think all the testing done in public schools is so ridiculous, and I would really hate to have it come here too."

Posters sold to commemorate Bush

By Holly Smith
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Varney's Book Store is selling posters commemorating President George W. Bush's Jan. 23 Landon Lecture.

Jeff Levin, owner and manager of Varney's, said the posters are $5 and all proceeds benefit the Landon Lecture Series.

"President Bush's appearance did cost the university some money and these types of sales help offset those expenses," Levin said. "We don't want to be perceived as making money off of the President's presence."

Varney's received 1,000 posters and will continue the sale until the posters are sold out. Levin said they are not planning on ordering any additional President Bush memorabilia.

Varney's did not receive the posters until two days after President Bush's visit, and Levin said a demand had accumulated by the time the posters started selling.

"It's not often that the president comes to campus, so there was a great interest," he said.

Kody Enlow, employee of Varney's Bookstore, said the majority of the customers she has sold posters to were K-State students.

"A lot of students who couldn't get into the lecture really wanted some way to commemorate Bush's visit," said Enlow, senior in mass communications.

K-State's Shalee Lehning drives baseline against Missouri. K-State will play Nebraska Saturday evening at Bramlage Coliseum.

Women hope for consistency Saturday

By Matthew Girard
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

There are typically two halves of 20 minutes each in a college basketball game, but for the K-State Wildcats the latter 20 minutes have given the team the most trouble.

In the last six games, the Wildcats (15-5, 5-4) have dominated their opponents in the first half, averaging 38.1 points per half to the opponents' 24.3 points.

The second half, during the same six game stretch, has been the complete opposite. Despite the Wildcats having a 4-2 record and jogging in the locker room at the break with a lead in the last six games, opponents have outscored K-State by an average of 37.2 points to 30.7 points.

Although it might appear K-State isn't capable of finishing games, freshman Shalee Lehning said it's not an issue.

"Right now we are just in the learning process, we are a young team," Lehning said. "We are having some issues later in the games — we're just not executing to our ability, but we are going to start finishing games like we need to."

K-State will get the chance to finish its games and bounce back from a 66-65 overtime loss to Missouri Wednesday, against the Nebraska Cornhuskers (12-7, 4-4) at 7 p.m. Saturday in Bramlage Coliseum.

The Cornhuskers have crept their way up in the Big 12 Conference standings with a two-game win streak heading into Saturday's tilt in Manhattan.

"They are a good team, and they are going to come with great defense, and we are just going to have to really work on our execution," Lehning said.

Junior Kiera Hardy and freshman Kelsey Griffin lead Nebraska. Hardy is sixth in the Big 12 in scoring at 17.5 points per game and Griffin is averaging 13.8 points per game and is fifth in the league in field-goal shooting percentage (43.6 percent).

"They are a really physically, strong basketball team that plays so smart," coach Deb Patterson said. "They execute really well, and they have a real exciting freshman in Griffin. With Hardy they've got one of the best playmakers in the league, and their post players are so solid."

Along with the offensive production of Hardy and Griffin, the Cornhuskers are forcing opponents into mistakes. In its wins over Colorado and Iowa State, the Nebraska defense forced 23 and 21 turnovers, respectively.

Junior Claire Coggins said, the focus of the Wildcats game against the Cornhuskers is to win.

"Nebraska is a really great team, and they are another Big 12 North division team that is ready to come in here and beat us," Coggins said. "We just have to come out and show our confidence and show ourselves, and everybody else that might have a doubt in their mind that we can win and we will win because we are good enough to win."

Cats seek clean play versus Tech

KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Keep it clean.

This is the message Coach Steve Bietau gave his team after last weekend's dual match with Drake. Despite winning 7-0, the K-State women's tennis team still had some trouble with its fundamentals.

"I think one of the greatest compliments that can be paid to a tennis player, and maybe any athlete, is that they don't beat themselves," Bietau said. "We have some players who can be very offensive but at the same time, I think we need to get better at just hanging around. When things aren't going well we need to do things to extend our opponent."

Bietau said sophomore Tamar Kvaratskhelia, who has all the offensive tools to give opponents fits, has needed some extra work on her defense. To address this problem assistant coach Marcos Mendez spent the week working with Kvaratskhelia on her transition game.

over the roster and decided the team lacked something — speed. Prince knows you can't teach speed. Either you have it, or you don't.

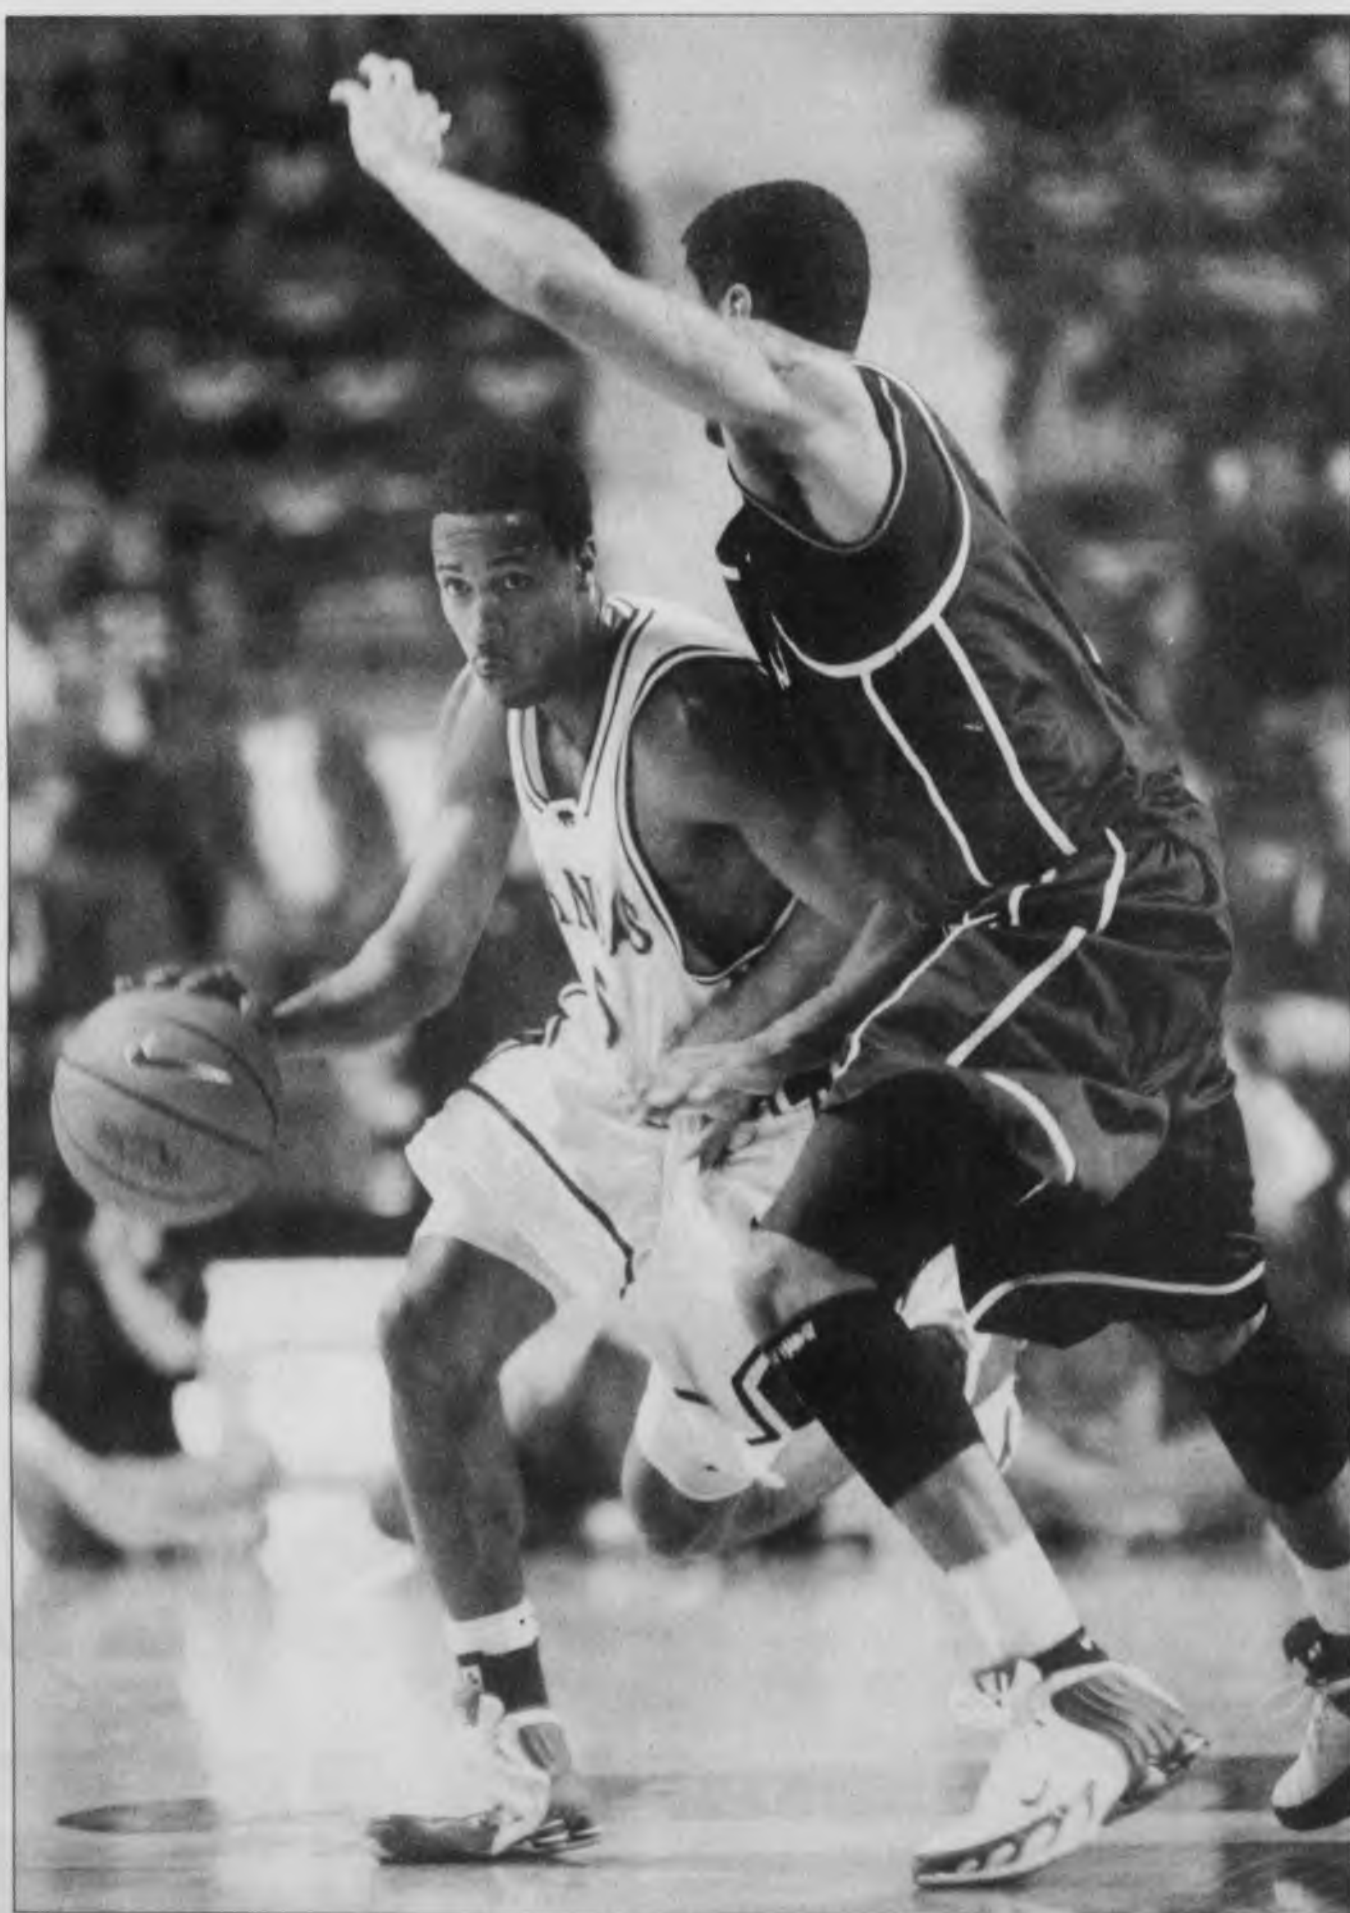

Prince also knows in order to win the Big 12 Conference North, speed needs to be a staple of his squad.

So, in two short months, Prince tried his best to recruit as many players with as much speed and athleticism as he could.

He succeeded. "There is no question that I think right now in college football that the premium is on speed," Prince said. "When you play here in the Big 12, I think being able to play fast through November is critical."

"If you can make sure that throughout a season you can maintain functional speed ... then I think you give yourself a chance in every ballgame." K-State's recruiting class may not be the highest rated class in the Big 12 North. In fact, Scout's Inc.'s average

Men search for quick turnaround

By Mark Potter
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Ten days ago, the K-State men's basketball team was tied for second in the Big 12 Conference.

Now, after two-straight road losses — including a 72-70 overtime loss to then-winless Baylor on Wednesday — the Wildcats (12-6, 3-4 Big 12) are tied for sixth and left searching for answers.

"That was really a heart breaker, not only for us, but for the program as well," junior forward Cartier Martin said of K-State's most recent loss. "We really felt like we should have won the game. It wasn't anyone's fault but ours, the players. We just didn't get the job done."

The Wildcats will need to put their past behind them when they host Oklahoma State (12-9, 2-5) at a sold-out Bramlage Coliseum on Saturday, sophomore guard Clint Stewart said.

"(Losing to Baylor) was hard to swallow, but we have got to move forward," Stewart said. "We think our backs are against the wall, but (Oklahoma State's) backs are really against the wall. They are going to play hard, so we have to match their intensity and grind one out."

"Obviously we are a little bit down, but if we want to win on Saturday, we have to come out with some fire and some confidence."

Oklahoma State, which won the Big 12 Tournament last season, has only one returning starter from a year ago — sophomore guard James On Curry.

scorers, along with juniors Mario Boggan and Torre Johnson.

K-State's Martin averages 19.4 points per game, good for fourth in the Big 12. Martin also ranks fifth in the conference in rebounding at 7.5 rebounds per game.

In addition, Martin has scored in double figures in every game this season, but he said he only is concerned with helping his team win.

"Scoring in double figures is not one of my goals," Martin said. "My goal is to win the game. It doesn't matter if I don't score at all, as long as we get a win."

The last time the teams played, Oklahoma State defeated K-State 77-57 on Feb. 2, 2005 in Stillwater, Okla.

This season, the Cowboys have had trouble finding a rhythm, as they have committed more turnovers (356) than any team in the Big 12.

However, Oklahoma State enters Saturday's game leading the Big 12 in field-goal percentage (.500), and Edie Sutton's squad ranks second in free-throw percentage (.728).

K-State, on the other hand, ranks third in the Big 12 in field goal percentage defense during conference play (.382).

Stewart, who led K-State with a career-high 19 points against Baylor, is a native of Broken Arrow, Okla., which is about an hour drive from Stillwater.

The track and field team heads to Lincoln, Neb., this weekend for the Sevine Husker Invitational.

junior college tight end

One day after announcing a recruiting class of 27 student-athletes, K-State football coach Ron Prince's inaugural list of signees grew by one on Thursday afternoon with the addition of Northeastern Oklahoma A&M tight end Michael Pooschke.

Pooschke who signed a National Letter of Intent (NLI) with the Wildcats in December, has signed new financial aid paperwork and will join the program for the 2006 season.

The 6-foot-3, 245-pound Pooschke blossomed as a sophomore this past season as both a blocker and a receiver.

He finished 2005 with 22 receptions for 291 yards and a touchdown, including four receptions for 43 yards in NEO's bowl victory against Mississippi Gulf Coast in the Dalton Defenders Bowl.

He also returned three kickoffs for 25 yards during 2005 and served as NEO's long-snapper.

Super Bowl parties give reason to get festive

By Ben Spicer
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Many fans, the Super Bowl is the reward for sitting through 20 weeks of intense football action. But with a little extra entertainment and specialty foods, even those not familiar with the teams or the sport itself can still find themselves a good time.

FUN AND GAMES

According to www.party411.com, there are many games and activities that anyone can play to liven up the Super Bowl.

A few suggestions include the traditional football pool on the score of the game, guessing on the combined total number of points, who scores the first touchdown or who wins the coin flip.

Andy Carter, junior in marketing, said his ideal Super Bowl party is entertaining and has just the right number of people.

"I think 15-20 people is about right," he said. "I don't really like the huge party scene."

This Super Bowl, Carter said he and his five roommates might move the television out onto their deck for the game. He said they plan to watch a majority of the game and will keep an eye out for new commercials.

For knowledgeable Super Bowl fans, a great idea for in-between quarters or halftime would be to play a trivia game. Collecting historical facts of the game from the Internet and turning them into questions is a way to stir up some debate between guests.

A piñata is another suggested idea from Party411.com. According to the Web site, it is a great way for upset and grumbling fans to take out their aggression if their team is losing.

CREATIVE FOOD IDEAS

Hosts who want to avoid serving typical foods and snacks could try using some of these suggestions instead of ordering the usual pizza.

According to www.fabulousfoods.com, a slow cooker could be used to keep food warm throughout the game. Some ideas from the Web site include chilies, gumbos and stews, which can add a more distinctive feel to your party.

Brian Braden, senior in elementary education, said he does not intend to go out and find a massive party for the game.

"It's easier to sit at home, and watch it on my 52-inch big screen," he said.

Braden also said he and his friends will probably eat something simple for food — something half-way traditional like buffalo wings or chili.

"No matter what we do, I'm sure alcohol will have a big part," he said.

Another easy way to have plenty of food for guests according to the Web site is to provide a sandwich buffet. By providing all types of breads, meats, and fixings, a buffet will be sure to allow everyone to eat what they want.

For those not interested in the hassles of serious cooking, the Web site also suggests having plenty of dips and nutty snacks that one could use for chips, instead of the usual salsa or queso.

DECORATIONS

According to www.superbowlpartytime.com, decorating the outside of your house is an excellent way of indicating to guests where your place is for those that have never been there.

When thinking about decorations, it suggests using team colors as an indication for whom you are supporting. The Web site also reiterates that this is a party where it is best not to get out the fine china, so use paper plates or the cheaper stuff instead.

Setup is crucial to the success of a Super Bowl party, according to www.about.com. They suggest using as many televisions as possible to ensure no one misses any kind of action.

Scot Carson, junior in social science, has thrown Super Bowl parties back home and wants to do the same things this weekend.

"We're gonna probably have around 20 people or so that end up watching the game," he said. "It's not only guys, it's girls too. Typically, it's about half-and-half."

SIU professor continues ceramic workshop today

By Mark Sibilla
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Specializing in two distinct forms of ceramic artistry, Paul Dresang was invited by the K-State art department to host a workshop and slide lecture, which he will present to students and anyone in the community interested in attending.

The workshop began Thursday and was in West Stadium 110. The workshop continues from 9 to 11 a.m. today in the same room. The lecture will also take place at 1 p.m. today at the Little Theatre in the K-State Student Union.

An internationally recognized artist, Dresang received his Master's in Fine Arts from the University of Minnesota in 1974. Dresang is now from Southern Illinois University in Edwardsville, Ill., where he is a professor of ceramics.

Dresang is best known for creating distinctive wheel-thrown, functional pottery, as well as ceramic sculptural constructions known as trompe l'oeil, which literally translates into 'fool the eye,' Anna Calluori Holcombe, professor of art said.

"Paul creates objects that look like leather bags or antique toys," Holcombe said. "They look like they are made of leather or fabric or metal, but they are actually made of clay."

During Thursday's workshops, Dresang began making a teapot, fulfilling the functional side of his work, and an antique tamping kit. As with most work falling under the trompe l'oeil label, the tamping kit looks as if it is made out of leather and metal, but it is instead made of clay. Dresang is scheduled to complete these items today during the second day of his workshops.

Students of various sculpting and ceramics classes chose Dresang to visit campus, Holcombe said.

"The professors gave the students a list of artists they were suggested to research," Holcombe said. "The students chose Dresang because his work was similar to the projects that a handful of people [students] were working on."

The students were then in charge of making arrangements for Dresang's visit and helping with the publicity for the event, Holcombe said.

During his lecture in the Little Theatre, Dresang is expected to show slides of his work from his career, and talk about various influences he has had, Holcombe said.

Steven Doll | COLLEGIAN

Sculptor Paul Dresang, professor of ceramics at Southern Illinois University in Edwardsville, Ill., shapes a piece of clay on a wheel to resemble an antique tamping kit during a workshop Thursday.

"We would like to see non-art-majors attend the lecture as well," Holcombe said. "It should have a lot of things of interest for many people because he will be showing a lot of his work that looks like antique toys."

Stellar acting takes 'McPhee' Firth-er

UNIVERSAL STUDIOS

By Meta Pettus
CAVALIER DAILY (U. VIRGINIA)

CHARLOTTESVILLE, Va. — Mr. Brown, a funeral home director and widowed father of seven, needs all the help he can get.

His brood has managed to get rid of 17 nannies — the last nanny bursting out of the front door in a fit of screams. Mr. Brown is in utter distress over this situation until a voice says: "The person you need is Nanny McPhee."

Just to set the record straight, Nanny McPhee is nothing like Mary Poppins. In fact, despite its vividly colored cinematography, "Nanny McPhee" initially seems too dark a film for small children. Audience members who stay in their seats, however, will find that the film's tone brightens as the story develops.

From her first appearance at the Brown residence as "a government nanny," McPhee's homely appearance and icy demeanor signal that she is a far cry from the sweet, doting nannies one usually associates with childcare. Emma Thompson exudes the perfect blend of ominous power and compassionate wisdom in her portrayal of the title character. Through Thompson, the cane-toting Nanny McPhee becomes both a woman to fear and to love.

Thompson is joined in this production by Colin Firth, who steps out of his usual serious roles to portray Mr. Brown.

Thompson's wonderful screenplay is a large part of the film's successful audience connection. Clearly, Thompson takes the knowledge she gained from "Sense and Sensibility" and applied it to this story, based on the "Nurse Matilda" books. The plot unfolds without a hitch and each line is filled with meaning.

Row for Humanity to benefit charities

By Wendy Haun
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The Manhattan Town Center will be transformed Saturday for the 10th annual Row for Humanity fundraiser.

There will be people erging — or rowing on rowing machines — in one-hour time periods, said Amy Thornburrow, sophomore in mass communications and president of the Kansas State Rowing Association.

"Every hour there will be a different group of people erging," she said. "There will be two open ergs for people in the community who want to learn how to row."

This is the biggest fundraiser of the year for both Habitat for Humanity and the crew teams, Thornburrow said. This is the second year the event will take place in the Manhattan Town Center.

The event is sponsored by K-State men's crew and Kansas State Rowing Association junior crew, and proceeds go to K-State men's crew, KSRA junior and the Manhattan and K-State chapters of Habitat for Humanity.

Thornburrow said the crews have raised more than $4,000, but there also will be two donation tables available.

In addition, the rowing team will help paint houses

Craig Doan, sophomore in biochemistry and men's rowing captain, said the money will help offset some of the costs of the club.

"It will help us gain some money to pay for our larger events," he said. "We go to Collegiate Nationals in Pennsylvania, and we practice in Waco, (Texas), over spring break."

Doan said the event generates publicity for the teams.

"We want to let the community know that we are a club sport," he said. "This way, people know that we're here and they can join and let everyone know what's going on."

The publicity from the event will benefit the club, said Lauren Harms, junior at Manhattan High School and team president of KSRA's high school team.

"We get our name out there and we also get to help Habitat for Humanity," she said.

Basie Orchestra to perform at K-State

The sounds of swing-time jazz will resonate through the halls of McCain Auditorium Saturday.

The Count Basie Orchestra with Nnenna Freelon will perform at K-State at 8 p.m.

Thom Jackson, marketing and development officer for McCain, said they wanted the orchestra because the band is a part of American history.

"This is one of the pinnacle bands that defined American jazz music," he said.

Several members of the band played with Count Basie, who died in April 1984. Freelon is a five-time Grammy-nominated singer will also perform and present an homage to legendary singer Billie Holiday.

"I think students are going to love the music," he said, "and the vocals of Nnenna Freelon doesn't hurt."

There will also be a pre-performance lecture by Al Cochran in McCain 204 at 7 p.m.

Cochran, assistant provost and professor of music, said he will talk about the band and how they came about.

"They actually formed in Kansas City," he said. "I will be talking about that and playing sections of music that have been recorded."

He said Basie's band has always been a personal favorite of his.

"The band is a phenomenal organization," he said. "The musicians are all top-notch players, and the music appeals to a broad range of people."

College is a time of experimentation, both good and bad.

From study habits to party habits, students might find themselves trying things they never had the opportunity or desire to in high school, such as smoking. That doesn't always offer good experiences, however.

Katie Franke, sophomore in geography, said she grew up in a family of smokers, but never tried it before coming to K-State.

"I started about a week into when I got to college, because I ... wanted to see what it was about," Franke said. "I did it once, and thought that would be it, but it lasted like eight months."

Carol Kennedy, director of health education and promotion at Lafene Health Center, said she has a feeling that freshmen taking up smoking may be an issue, because they have more freedom in college, but couldn't otherwise comment on the issue because she didn't have specific information on the matter.

According to a study conducted by the University of Michigan, 3 percent of their incoming freshmen reported smoking cigarettes when they came to the university, but by the end of the year that percentage had increased to 25 percent.

Bill Arck, director of alcohol and other drug-related education services with University Counseling Services, said similar research regarding freshmen has not been conducted at K-State, though he doesn't think freshmen smoking is a trend that is growing.

"We had a somewhat interesting reduction of smoking in spring 2005, so if you ask me, I don't think more freshmen are picking up the habit," Arck said.

In a 2003 University of California — Los Angeles Graduate School of Education and Information Studies national survey, a record-low 6.3 percent of entering college freshmen reported frequent cigarette smoking, down from an all-time high of 12.7 percent in 1998, suggesting that K-State is part of a national trend in falling numbers of freshmen smokers, at least to begin with.

Whether the percentage significantly increases by year end has yet to be seen, especially since many freshmen who take up the habit don't believe they actually have a habit — which can make quitting difficult.

"I think it's a paradox — the more I heard 'don't smoke' throughout middle and high school, the more I wanted to try it out, see what the talk was about, what I was missing out on."

"What we do find is many students smoke when they drink, but not really any other time, so they don't consider themselves 'smokers,'" Arck said. "But every time they drink, they're smoking."

Franke, who said she quit smoking, said she never really thought of herself as a smoker, though her habit lasted through much of her freshman year.

"It was social, or when I was stressed or frustrated. But then when I would smoke, I'd go through a whole pack," she said.

For students who have acquired a smoking habit, and who would like to quit, there are resources here on campus that can help. K-Staters Inspired to Stop Smoking, also known as KISS, is a program run through Lafene that provides services to students who desire to quit, but may be having trouble.

Franke said she didn't think freshmen smoking is an issue that the university should look deeply into, however.

"I think it's a paradox — the more I heard 'don't smoke' throughout middle and high school, the more I wanted to try it out, see what the talk was about, what I was missing out on," she said.

"When you get to college you hear a lot about not drinking, and what do most students do? I don't think preaching about smoking would help."

Dean exposes the truth about free tuition, GPAs, dating and other popular myths on campus

By Dayne Logan

There is a law in Hollywood, Calif., that states it is illegal to peel oranges in hotel rooms, according to www.bitoffun.com. In Idaho it is illegal to ride merry-go-rounds on Sundays. In Lawrence, Kan., the law states all cars entering the city must sound their horns to warn horses of their arrival.

Laws that people may view as funny or irrelevant can be found in law books across the nation. There are even calendars full of them.

Late-night comedians do whole segments poking fun at these laws and there are hundreds of Web sites focused on them.

But what about at K-State — does it have rules that many people consider strange too?

Many students seem to think so.

Becca Nichols, junior in the pre-health professions program, is one such student. Nichols said she has heard that the university has two very peculiar policies, although she is not sure whether they are truth or myth.

"I've heard that if a student gets hit by a vehicle while on a campus crosswalk, that student gets free tuition for a semester," Nichols said.

The second myth, Nichols said she wondered about concerns a student living in the residence halls who has a roommate die.

Will that student receive a 4.0 grade point average for the semester?

"I've heard both of those, but I doubt they're true," John McKenzie, sophomore in professional architectural engineering, said.

"They're not true," Pat Bosco, dean of student life, said. "Unfortunately people get hit on crosswalks all the time, and the university does all that it can to help them, but the free tuition part is a myth."

In regard to the second myth, Bosco said in the event of the student death, K-State offers counseling services and other types of assistance not only to the student's roommate, but also to anyone else involved in the life of the student.

The 4.0 GPA, however, is a myth, Bosco said.

There are some myths however, that Bosco said are actually true.

"If an enrolled student is sent to Iraq, the university will sometimes allow them to be refunded their tuition money past the course drop date," Bosco said.

Similarly, if a student is sent to war and is very close to completing the semester, sometimes the university will allow them to finish their coursework early Bosco said.

"It's a case-by-case situation," Bosco said.

He also said he believes the myth that walking under the arch at the Marianna Kistler Beach Museum of Art gives students good luck.

"I think it works before a big test or before asking someone on a date," Bosco said.

5 sororities vote to increase membership numbers

Five sororities, Alpha Chi Omega, Alpha Xi Delta, Kappa Delta, Kappa Alpha Theta and Sigma Kappa, recently voted to increase their memberships from 115 to 140.

The change took effect on Dec. 5, 2005, paving the way for spring recruitment.

Lisa Fant, assistant director of Greek Affairs, said the sororities have a lot of women on campus wanting to join, and the Panhellenic Council, the greek system's governing body wants to provide them the opportunity to do so.

"One of the goals of Panhellenic Council is to give unfiliated women chances to join our house," Fant said.

Meanwhile, gaining new members will cast positive images on sororities, Fant said.
